Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, may I ask the chairman if it was not stated to the committee that this work has grown in importance and requires constant work and more or less experience? Just picking these men up for this laboratory work and paying them out of the lump sum, as they did heretofore, does not give satisfactory results. Where we provide for six, I believe there were nine before, and the work has now been classified and standardized so that it requires, according to my understanding, about the same level in efficiency and time, and in order to guarantee this permanence and efficiency they struck out all of this gradation of salaries and put these men who did practically the same work on the same salary and reduced the number to the minimum that they can get along with.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, Mr. President, that it would be very much better if we had had three at $1,200 and three at $1,000, and that would have allowed for the new man who came in. A new man coming into the bureau no doubt would take the position at $1,000, and then he would have a chance for a promotion to $1,200; in fact, he would receive a promotion to $1,200 when earned.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As I understand it, new men are not inducted into this class of work. The six they provide for must be more or less trained men, not old veterans, but men on whom they can rely, and in order not to have any inefficiency, as nearly as they may evade it, they took the six and provided that they should receive $1,200, in order that they might get the class of men they themselves perhaps had trained to do the work efficiently.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that that is exactly the argument that was used, that it would be in the interest of economy to have the salaries sufficiently high to get good, intelligent men, because in all this kind of work it requires some skill, and it is necessary to get men who will keep their places, at least for a few years, in order that they may become efficient in their work.

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize that fact, Mr. President, but it is true that these laboratory aids or laboratory helpers expect to be promoted, and they ought to have the chance of promotion beyond the stage of helper or beyond the stage of aid in the laboratory. When one is promoted there is a new man to take his place, and he is not nearly as efficient as the old employee who has learned the business thoroughly; and that is why there have been these graded salaries in the past. I think myself there have been too many of them in the past, and I still believe there ought to be two, and I think if you are going to have the six laboratory assistants there ought to be three at a thousand dollars and three at twelve hundred dollars.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the Senator will observe that in the Bureau of Animal Industry there are the higher class of men provided for in the first part of the paragraph—one chief, at $5,000; one chief clerk, at $2,000; one editor and compiler; one executive assistant; and six executive clerks. They are in the higher class, and these $1,200 men, if they prove their efficiency and vacancies occur, would move up into the other classes. I think if the Senator had heard the discussion of the technical training that was necessary and the absolute impossibility of holding anything like an efficient man—just pick him up for a week or 10 days and pay him $500 or $600 for what time he gave—he would be impressed with the fact that it is not satisfactory.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware of that. But the employees referred to by the Senator—the chief clerk and others—never are in the laboratory and know nothing about the laboratory. They never are classed there, and we expect that these people will educate themselves along that line, so that they can enter the laboratory and do the laboratory work. These are positions of helpers to the men who do the work in the laboratory. I refer to the scientists who must be there and their helpers. If they go in there they ought to receive sufficient salary that they will remain, just as the Senator says. They could not keep them there for $600, but they have $600, $720, $840, $960, $1,000, and $1,020. These were the divisions that we had, and you could not keep them there; but it seems to me that if we had the two divisions—that is, the lowest that would be paid to the helper would be $1,000, and then he would have a chance to increase and receive his promotion to $1,200, the amount fixed in the bill not only for the helpers but for the aid himself—that would be the proper way to do it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If there were gradations in the work it might be all right, but this class of work is all about the same.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will allow it to go to conference the conferees will try to adjust it. I will make a notation of it.

Mr. SMOOT. All right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 5, after "$900," to insert "50 laborers, at $960 each"; in line 8, after the word "each," to strike out "4 laborers, at $600 each; 24 laborers, at $600 each; 32 laborers, at $540 each; 30 laborers, at $480 each"; in line 12, after the word "each," to insert "5 messenger boys, at $540 each"; in line 13, after the word "each," to strike out "8 messenger boys, at $380 each"; and in line 17, after the words "in all," to strike out "$656,390" and insert "$653,210," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, Bureau of Animal Industry: One chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,500; 1 editor and compiler, $2,250; 1 executive assistant, $2,500; 6 executive clerks, at $2,000 each; 22 clerks, class 4; 1 clerk, $1,680; 27 clerks, class 3; 17 clerks, at $1,500 each; 36 clerks, class 2; 3 clerks, at $1,380 each; 19 clerks, at $1,320 each; 1 clerk, $1,300; 3 clerks, at $1,260 each; 237 clerks, class 1; 1 architect, $2,000; 1 illustrator, $1,400; 1 laboratory aid, $1,200; 1 laboratory helper, $1,200; 6 laboratory assistants, at $1,200 each; 1 laboratory mechanician, $1,440; 1 carpenter, $1,140; 2 carpenters, at $1,000 each; 2 messengers and custodians, at $1,200 each; 1 quarantine assistant, $900; 1 skilled laborer, $1,200; 3 skilled laborers, at $1,000 each; 11 skilled laborers, at $900 each; 1 painter, $900; 50 laborers, at $960 each; 2 laborers, at $900 each; 11 messengers or laborers, at $840 each; 3 laborers, at $780 each; 29 messengers or laborers, at $720 each; 2 messenger boys, at $660 each; 3 messenger boys, at $600 each; 5 messenger boys, at $540 each; 25 messenger boys, at $480 each; 1 charwoman, $600; 2 charwomen, at $540 each; 17 charwomen, at $480 each; 5 charwomen, at $360 each; 2 charwomen, at $300 each; 7 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $653,210.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to say just a word at this point. It will be noted that there is no increase in the total amount for this bureau. The bill as passed by the House carried an appropriation of $656,390 and the bill now carries $653,210, so that there is really a decrease instead of an increase.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; there is a decrease in the appropriation, but I will state how it comes about. The number of employees in the department has been decreased, but their salaries have been increased. If the old salaries had remained, of course, there would be a great deal larger decrease than there is here. I think myself that perhaps the number of employees ought to be decreased, but that, of course, is for the Senate to decide.

I want to say further that if these figures are fixed in the bill for laborers at $960 each, I am afraid we will have to change all the other appropriation bills to conform to this bill. I know that it will be pointed to immediately by every other division and bureau and department of the Government.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "General expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry," on page 15, line 5, after the word "authorities," to strike out "$1,300,000" and insert "$1,484,440"; in line 7, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$100,000 of which shall be immediately available"; and in line 8, before the words "for the," to strike out "$500,000" and insert "$684,440," so as to read:

For investigating the disease of tuberculosis of animals, for its control and eradication, for the tuberculin testing of animals, and for researches concerning the cause of the disease, its modes of spread, and methods of treatment and prevention, including demonstrations, the formation of organizations, and such other means as may be necessary, either independently or in cooperation with farmers, associations, State, Territory, or county authorities, $1,484,440, of which $800,000 shall be set aside for administrative and operating expenses and $684,440 for the payment of indemnities.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for investigating the disease of tuberculosis of animals, etc., on page 17, line 4, after the word "That," to insert "hereafter," and in line 12, after the word "owner," to insert "And provided further, That not to exceed $200,000 of the appropriation for the payment of indemnities carried in the Agricultural act for 1920, may be used for administrative and operating expenses during said fiscal year," so as to make the proviso read:

And provided further, That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, permit cattle which have been shipped for breeding or feeding purposes from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, to another State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, and which have reacted to the tuberculin test subsequent to such shipment, to be reshipped in interstate commerce to the original owner: And provided further, That not to exceed $200,000 of the appropriation for the payment of indemnities, carried in the Agricultural act for 1920, may be used for administrative and operating expenses during said fiscal year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I take it that is a transfer of appropriation?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; that is a transfer. The present act provides for a fund of $1,500,000 provided on what we call the fifty-fifty plan—$750,000 for administrative purposes and the other $750,000 for payment of indemnities. We have $1,000,000 which is practically untouched. The amount appropriated for it in last year's bill was not sufficient for carrying out the work by the department. There is a deficit, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I know it, and that is what I object to. I object to having deficiencies come in any appropriation bill outside of a deficiency appropriation bill. It is just because of this kind of appropriations that we can not keep any track of what the deficiencies are, and the reason why the deficiency appropriation bill is framed is in order that the Government may have all of the deficiencies included in one appropriation bill.

Mr. GRONNA. But let me say to the Senator it would not be regarded as a real deficiency. There is nearly a million dollars to the credit of the Agricultural Department for indemnities.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware of that. This is a transfer from an appropriation that was made for payment of indemnities to an account, for paying people here in the District and employing more clerks. We ought to put our foot on that practice, and we never ought to have allowed the Agricultural Department, or any other department, I do not care what department it may be of the Government, to do such a thing. It never should be allowed. The Government of the United States gave them the appropriation for administrative and operating expenses during the fiscal year 1920. They have spent all the money appropriated for that purpose and now——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I just want to ask the chairman of the committee whether the facts presented by the department showed that the allegation made by the Senator from Utah is true, that they had used more of that appropriation for expenses here in the District than they should have done and did not use it for the purpose for which it was appropriated?

Mr. GRONNA. As I understand it, the conditions were such that they used all that was specifically appropriated for administrative purposes but did not use all the appropriation for indemnity. There was a surplus carried over of $800,000, and therefore we are now asking to transfer out of that fund to meet the deficit incurred by the department which we did not sufficiently appropriate for.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I thought. As long as we allow the transfer of money from one account to another, the Congress of the United States will never know the actual cost of administration.

This $200,000 was appropriated by Congress for the payment of indemnities carried in the Agricultural act of 1920. That was what Congress appropriated the money for; and it also appropriated an amount for administrative and operating expenses during the fiscal year 1920. Now, the Agricultural Department could not spend the amount of money that was appropriated for indemnities, and they now come and ask us to give them $200,000 of that money appropriated for indemnities to be used for administrative and operating expenses during the calendar year 1920. If they have used money for administrative and operating expenses there is a deficiency, and that ought to be appropriated for in the regular way. There ought to be an estimate made for it, and it ought to go into the deficiency appropriation bill and not come in in this way.

I say to the Senate that I do not believe the House will stand for this transfer, and I should like to have it go out. If the money has already been spent, it has been unlawfully spent, and, of course, all we can do is to make an appropriation in a deficiency bill to cover it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I wish to read the justification for this item.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall be glad to have the Senator read it.

Mr. GRONNA. It is as follows:

The amount recommended by the Senate committee for the eradication of tuberculosis of live stock is approximately the same as that carried in the 1920 appropriation act ($1,500,000), the apparent decrease being accounted for by the transfer of a number of employees to the statutory roll.

The House bill provides $800,000 for administrative and operating expenses and $500,000 for the payment of indemnities. In the Senate committee bill the latter item has been increased to $680,440.

With the increased demand from the farmers to have their herds freed from tuberculosis, the number of diseased animals gradually increases and it necessarily follows that the amount of indemnity claimed increases at a corresponding rate. During August, 1919, the amount of indemnity claimed for tuberculous animals by live-stock owners was $9,862.80, but in January, 1920, the indemnity claims had increased to $64,602.50.

Mr. SMOOT. Right there, I desire to say to the Senator that this amendment takes $200,000 from the indemnity fund and puts it into the fund for administrative and operating expenses.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I desire to make a suggestion to the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think, perhaps, the Senator from Utah and I are both mistaken. If I recall the matter correctly, this is the limitation on how much may be spent for administrative purposes rather than a transfer.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator is wrong. The language is so plain that anybody can understand it. It reads:

That not to exceed $200,000 of the appropriation for the payment of indemnities, carried in the agricultural act for 1920, may be used for administrative and operating expenses during said fiscal year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is the whole secret of it—"during said fiscal year."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is right.

Mr. WADSWORTH. "Said fiscal year" 1920, which is this year.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; that is what I mean.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This is a limitation placed upon the use of this money under the appropriation made for the fiscal year in which we are now operating. This is not a transfer of $200,000 from an unexpended balance of this year to next year.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that; but I say that if we transfer the money, and the department has not enough clerks here to administer this work, it will go and get them; there is no doubt about that at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We are not doing that.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what this provision says. This provision says that out of the appropriation for the Agricultural Department for 1920, which was made for the payment of indemnities, a transfer of $200,000 may be used for administrative and operating expenses during this year, which ends June 30, 1920. If they have not money enough to carry on the work until June 30, 1920, then there will be a deficiency.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The idea of the committee was to keep them from spending more than $200,000, which they were threatening to do. We say not to exceed $200,000 of that appropriation shall be spent for administrative purposes in this fiscal year, which is already three-fourths passed.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, if the Senator's position is correct, he will have to admit that the Secretary of Agriculture is taking money from one fund to expend for some purpose other than that authorized.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the Senator from Utah the language of last year's appropriation bill before him?

Mr. SMOOT. The statement made by the Senator and the reading of the letter by the Senator from North Dakota demonstrate the fact that my contention is correct.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No. The matter which the Senator from North Dakota read had to do with the increase on page 15.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator having the bill in charge if the position which I have taken is not correct?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I think that all of the Senators in a way are correct. Let me correct the statement which I made a moment ago. I stated that the present law provides for an appropriation of a million and a half dollars, $750,000 to be used for administrative purposes and $750,000 for indemnities. That was not correct. That was the way the Senate committee reported the bill to the Senate, but in conference it was changed so that the law really carried $1,000,000 for indemnities and $500,000 for administrative purposes. That was not sufficient, and we were warned by the department last year that the work could not possibly be done for $500,000. It is true, as the Senator from Utah states, that if we adopt this language we authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to take not to exceed $200,000 from the indemnity fund.

Mr. HARRISON. But, Mr. President, it was because the administrative expenses were so much greater than it was thought they would be, and the expense for the payment of indemnities was less than what it was thought it would be.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that that is the case as to every appropriation made by Congress. Whenever an appropriation is made and the work is not sufficient to absorb the money the department is going to find some way to spend the money. This is another case of just what happens in every such appropriation.

Mr. GRONNA. May I answer the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. If the $500,000 that Congress appropriated for the administrative work is not sufficient, the Secretary of Agriculture knows how to get the money.

I do not want to make a point of order against this amendment, although I think I can convince the Senator that it ought not to be here; but if the $500,000 is not sufficient to carry on the administrative work until June 30, 1920, there is a way to get the money and that is by an estimate transmitted through the Treasury Department and an appropriation made in a deficiency bill. That is the way to get it. Why should we take $200,000 from a fund which was provided to pay indemnities and transfer it to the administrative activities of the department of the Government?

Mr. HARRISON. It was included in the total appropriation for this particular work. Is not that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it was in the total appropriation.

Mr. HARRISON. Absolutely.

Mr. SMOOT. But does the Senator think if there were $400,000 appropriated in this bill for the eradication of the boll weevil that the Secretary of Agriculture could transfer that fund and use it for the cutting of timber upon the forest reserves?

Mr. HARRISON. No; and that is not analogous.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly the same as this case.

Mr. HARRISON. If the chairman of the committee will bear with me for a moment, I do not think it is analogous at all. Here is a provision for investigating the diseases of tuberculosis in animals and $1,300,000 was appropriated for that purpose. A part of that $1,300,000 was for administrative purposes; $500,000 was for indemnities. In the expenditure of the money it was found that the administrative expenses were very much greater than what it was expected they would be and the indemnities were less, all coming out of the sum total. Now, all they ask, as I see it, is that the amount that was to be expended for indemnities only be transferred and made available for needed administrative expenses, the amount appropriated for that purpose, perhaps, having been expended.

Mr. SMOOT. The same thing has happened time and time again in connection with appropriations for the other departments; but we have almost completely wiped it out of the other appropriation bills. If $200,000 are necessary to run the administrative work of this service up to June, 1920, there will have to be an estimate made for it, which will have to come through the Secretary of the Treasury, and then there will have to be an appropriation made for it. Congress would not give what was asked for in the last appropriation bill, and therefore it is a deficiency, and that is the way it should be met.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will allow this item to go out, and let it be provided for in the regular way.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, just a word. I find no fault with the criticism of the Senator from Utah, but in justice to the Department of Agriculture I wish to say that the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate were told last year that $500,000 would not be sufficient to carry on the administrative work. If my recollection serves me right, they wanted $800,000 for this purpose, and they were given only $500,000. If it is wrong in principle to take $200,000 from this fund, then, of course, the Senator from Utah is right, and the item ought to go out; but I will suggest to the Senator that the Members of the House read the RECORD very carefully, and I am sure that they will read what the Senator from Utah has said, and if the Senator from Utah will allow this item to go to conference we can adjust it, I think, by changing the totals in the paragraph preceding. I think that can be arranged.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can not change it in this item of the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Not in this particular item, but in connection with the appropriations for the same bureau.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, so that the Senate and the Senator from North Dakota will know what my position is, I wish to say that eight years ago there was a practice inaugurated in nearly all the departments to cover up their deficiencies by inserting, following a specific appropriation, the words "$100,000 of which"—or whatever the amount might be—"shall be immediately available."

Those words were put in the appropriation bills for no other purpose than to cover deficiencies. The Appropriations Committee started a fight against that practice and have succeeded in eliminating such provisions in almost every instance. I am glad to see that the Senator and the committee having this bill in charge have eliminated the provision on page 15, "$100,000 of which shall be immediately available," referring to the appropriation just preceding. Unless that provision had been stricken out the department would have spent $100,000 of the appropriation for the coming fiscal year before June 30, 1920, the close of the present fiscal year. We have got to stop this practice, Senators. If there happens to be a deficiency it has got to come to Congress and be provided for in the regular way, and not by inserting the words "$100,000 of which shall be immediately available," or by the transfer of an appropriation from one account to another. I am sure the Senator from North Dakota feels as I do about the matter.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will agree to let the item go over. When I suggested to the Senator that it might be taken care of, I had reference to the item on page 15 of the bill where a division of the fund is made. It is possible that we may be able to increase the amount allowed for administrative purposes, so that we can strike out the amount to which the Senator refers.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the appropriations on page 15 for this purpose are for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. The item we have been discussing is to cover expenditures before June 30, 1920.

Mr. GRONNA. That is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. That is entirely a different proposition and can not be taken out of the appropriations that are provided for next year.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator is willing to let it go over——

Mr. SMOOT. I will be glad to do that.

Mr. GRONNA. I will take the matter up with the Secretary of Agriculture and also with the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is understood, then, that the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I desire to express my appreciation of the splendid manner in which the chairman of the committee has handled this bill. I do not think any appropriation measure has ever come before the Senate which has received more conscientious consideration. The chairman of the committee, in common, I think, with almost all the other members of the committee, has stood at all times for the utmost economy consistent with the great needs of the Agricultural Department.

One-third the population of the United States is engaged in agriculture and more than one-quarter of the national wealth is invested in farm enterprises. The chairman of the Appropriations Committee is of the opinion that the financial needs of the Government for the next fiscal year may exceed $5,000,000,000 for all purposes. The Agricultural bill before us to-day appropriates $32,000,000, which means that out of every $156 of the public funds only $1 will be spent on the Nation's most vital industry—the one on which every other industry depends. And yet I find Senators here who would reduce even this small appropriation recommended by the Agricultural Committee notwithstanding the bill as it now stands cuts the estimates of the Agricultural Department nearly $6,000,000, and is a reduction of $13,000,000 from the appropriation of 1919 for agricultural purposes. I favor the utmost economy in governmental expenditures and a substantial reduction in appropriations generally, but at a time when increased production is of supreme importance we must do the fair thing by the farmer. We can better afford to cut out some of the river and harbor, public building, and other pork-barrel appropriations than to cripple agricultural activities.

Unless the farm problems are considered with more sympathy by the public generally, and especially by Congress, a considerable part of our country may go hungry before many years. Farmers have been sandbagged by the disgraceful agricultural economic systems until the camel's back is broken; they are leaving the farms this spring by the tens of thousands. Already the abnormal congestion of the huge centers of population is such that we are having trouble in feeding the city population. Unless we about-face quickly in the treatment of the agricultural interests of America, a real food shortage will be encountered in the near future.

Mr. President, some indication of the way in which the farmers are getting away from the country is supplied by the United States Department of Agriculture from a recent survey of 3,775 farms in New York. It was disclosed as a result of this investigation—which covered so many farms that it is certainly typical—that there had been a decrease in the number of people on the farms in the last year of 3 per cent, and that the number of hired men decreased 17 per cent. If this ratio holds good for the State—and there is every reason to believe that it does—it means that 35,000 men have left the farms in this one State to go to the cities. They are getting out of a business which has been the goat of lawmakers, middlemen, and profit hogs in the last three years, and going toward the great "white way," to add still more hungry mouths to a population the farms must feed.

And the same alarming conditions prevail in the great Middle West—in the food center of the world. In what is generally considered to be the prosperous agricultural State of Iowa, the State free employment bureau says that not more than one-third of the farm boys who were in the Army are going back to the farms. He further says that "most of them want city jobs." Of course they want city jobs. Can you blame them? When they consider the $10 a hundred drop in hogs—which put the price far below the cost of production—the silly and senseless advance in the price of lumber needed to build farm homes, and the whole selfish demonstration we have seen toward the agricultural interests of the country in the last year, it is no wonder they leave. The astonishing thing is that more have not gone.

Any system of account such as the manufacturer and commercial concerns employ will show conclusively that the farmers are by no means receiving adequate remuneration. The reports of the Agricultural Department indicate that the average income of the American farmer is less than one-half the average wage of a carpenter, a bricklayer, a painter, or any other organized city trade.

Mr. President, the young men of the farms are not fools. You can not hand them a further supply of inflated atmosphere about the beauties of farm life, and then ask them to produce hogs at a loss of $5 or $6 a hundred and make any impression.

In my own State of Kansas the young men know that there was an increase of 190 per cent in the proportion of tenants from 1860 to 1910—and the census of this year is going to show a still more alarming condition. The farmers can not continue to pull themselves up by the boot straps on this land question—especially with the price of hogs below production cost. There is one county in Kansas—Sumner—with 55 per cent of tenants; and you know what that indicates. And here is another example, in Lincoln township in Pratt County, where there were 13 per cent of tenants in 1880, there are now more than 60 per cent. And you will find the same conditions in Missouri and Illinois and Indiana and Ohio and all points east. Dekalb County, Ill., for example, has 72 per cent of tenants.

In order to get a nation-wide view of the situation, let us consider for a moment the percentage of tenants for the United States as a whole, as shown by the census. This percentage in 1880 was 25.6; 1890, 28.4; 1900, 35.3; and 1910, 37. Many of the leading thinkers on agricultural economics believe that the census of this year will give a percentage of between 45 and 50 per cent, with hundreds of counties above 60 per cent, and perhaps some as high as 75 per cent.

Why is this condition with us? Can you expect anything else, Mr. President, in view of the faulty economic system we have allowed to grow up, in which the producer gets such a small part of the consumer's dollar? Do you know that in the Chicago district in May of last year, for example, the consumers paid 14 cents a quart for milk, and that the producers got 5.2 cents? In New York farmers got 6.1 cents a quart, while the consumers paid 16 cents.

It used to be said commonly that the farmer got half price for his products—half of the consumer's dollar. Evidently we are rapidly going downhill with that proportion. How long will it be until we have piled on so much graft and profiteering and senseless distribution costs on milk that the producer will get but 25 per cent? Evidently we are headed that way, Mr. President.

And consider the situation with regard to meat-producing animals right now. Hogs are selling in Kansas City at from $14 to $14.50; they ought to be at least $3 a hundred higher. Most of the fat cattle which have been going to market have been losing money for the owners; in many cases from $25 to $50 a head, and in some cases more. When you go to putting $80 cotton seed—and I might suggest that the probabilities are that the mill did not sell this product below the cost of production—and $2 corn and $18 grass into steers, it takes better prices than are now prevailing for one to get back his production cost.

Last July hogs brought a high price of $23.10 on the Kansas City market. By November they had slumped to $15.35. Yesterday the top prices of hogs in Kansas City was $14.60. In August last the high price of cattle on the Kansas City market was $18.90. Yesterday they were down to $12. In the price paid the farmer for two of his most important products, the high cost of living, it will be seen, has been reduced respectively 35 per cent and 50 per cent. But that is the only way in which the reduction has been manifest. There has been no corresponding reduction in the cost of setting the breakfast table. In the meantime, the cost of the farmer's clothing, shoes, furniture, sugar, implements, lumber, and everything he buys has increased from 100 to 300 per cent. As a rule he is paying higher prices now than he paid six months ago. That is one reason why the farmer is discontented. He feels, and correctly, I think, that somebody is making him the goat.

Of course, the net result of all this is that farmers are getting out of the cattle and hog business. Careful and conservative figures from the corn belt indicate a decline in pork production estimated as high as 25 per cent. All available figures point to a decline in beef production.

Official reports show that the United States is heading toward bankruptcy in its beef-cattle supply. In 1900 there were 89 cattle of all kinds to each 100 persons in this country. But in 1919 there were but 42 cattle to each 100 inhabitants. In 1907 our beef-type cattle numbered 51,566,000, and in 1919 the total had fallen to 44,385,000. With 7,000,000 less than we had in 1907 we are slaughtering annually at a rate of above 3,000,000 more cattle and almost twice as many calves.

Mr. President, unless substantial rewards are given for farm work a food shortage is inevitable—and it will not be long in coming. There already is some indication of this in the hardship which has come to the poorer people of the cities from the activities of the food pirates.

The farmer is not to blame. Notwithstanding the farmer is today marketing at a minimum profit and sometimes at a loss, he is producing more raw material per man by 30 per cent than before the war, due largely to long hours and the unpaid labor of his wife and children. This unpaid labor and overwork are materially responsible for so many leaving the farm.

Mr. President, the farmers are ready not only to do their share but to go the limit that the country and the world may have abundant foodstuffs. They protest, however, against any form of governmental price fixing and any system of distribution which compels them to take a greatly reduced price for their farm products while everything they buy is sold at profiteer prices. When the Government wheat minimum guaranty became operative it, in effect, acted as a maximum price and overnight reduced the price of wheat 50 to 75 cents a bushel—a loss of nearly $50,000,000 to the farmers of Kansas alone. The United States Grain Corporation throughout has exhausted every expedient to keep the prices of wheat down to the very minimum. It is no wonder that the farmer feels that he was treated unfairly and that the Grain Corporation has been operated in the interest of the profit-taking middlemen and the gamblers of the grain exchanges.

The Kansas farmer sold his wheat last year for an average of $1.85 per bushel because of the comparatively low quality of the wheat. All available statistics show that it costs at the present time more than $2 a bushel to grow wheat, averaged the country over, accounted for by the exorbitant wages paid. I know that a great many wheat growers paid as high as $8 and $10 a day for labor during the last harvest.

Farmers received an average of $1.50 per bushel for potatoes produced last year and practically the entire season's crop passed out of the farmer's hand at that price, but now the consumer is paying $4 a bushel for them.

The daily newspapers teem with articles about high retail prices, but say hardly a word about the collapse of the hog market. As a matter of fact, retail prices of pork and pork products actually have advanced in many cities during these recent months in which the wholesale market price of pork on the hoof has fallen nearly one-half. Still the city asks if the farmer is profiteering. Were that the case the winter-wheat area would have shown a heavy increase instead of a decrease of 23 per cent. That decline tells its own story. The reason for such reduced production is simply that the prices farmers receive for what they have to sell, together with the absence of hired help, and the cost of what they buy, is forcing farmers in self-defense to limit their efforts to what they can do with their own labor and equipment.

Mr. President, the time has arrived for constructive reasoning applied to the agricultural interests of the Nation. The farmers are asking no special favors; indeed, they are very much opposed to special privileges to any class. They are loyal Americans. Every meeting held recently and controlled by actual farmers is on record in opposition to all forms of bolshevism. All they ask for themselves is a square deal. Agriculture is the basic industry—if there is anything more fundamental than getting for the people enough to eat, I have never heard of it. And unless we do some real thinking along this line there will be people who will be hungry one of these days. It is essential that a constructive program be adopted at once, which will give the agricultural interests of this country a fair chance—that will enable farmers to develop their business, educate their children, and work into the most efficient production of food. And the effort and money required to bring this about will be the best investment that this country ever made. We will never be able to make the greatest industrial and business progress unless there is abundant food for the workers and at reasonable prices. And this can be obtained if there is a readjustment in our laws and economic systems which will allow farmers to buy the necessities at a fair price and which will allow them to obtain a price for their products which will give them some profit.

Mr. President, the first thing is to curb the profiteers and supply agricultural essentials, such as lumber, agricultural implements, clothing, shoes, and the like, at an honest price. We already have all the laws necessary to stop profiteering. If we can get rid of the price gouger, it will hold hundreds of thousands of farmers in the country, who are just on the point of leaving and who will go to the city, perhaps this year, unless something is done quickly.

To have a more prosperous agriculture we must also encourage legislation curbing manipulation of the market and gambling by the grain, provision, and stock-exchange sharks, who seek to control unjustly the supply and the prices of foodstuffs, cotton, and other necessities of life. We should also have Federal supervision of the packing industry.

A further extension in cooperation is needed in both country and city—it is essential in building up the agricultural interests. There should be prompt action on the legislation to remove all artificial restrictions on the sale of farm products, as contemplated in the Capper-Hersman bill, which seeks clearly to establish the rights of farmers to collectively market their own products without legal or other interference. It is along this road that big progress can be made in working out a better system of distribution and marketing. The marketing system of this country as applied to agricultural products is decidedly unsatisfactory in most cases. It must be made more efficient and less expensive. If farmers are allowed to work out a cooperation system of their own through the American Farm Bureau Federation, the Grange, the Farmers' Union, the Society of Equity, and the other loyal and efficient farm organizations, they will do much to eliminate the profit hogs and supply food to the cities at a lower cost, while making more than the cost of production themselves.

Then we must take up a serious study of the land question, Mr. President. We must recognize the axiom that the most prosperous and contented agriculture can be built only by home owners. If the cities hope to get food at a reasonable price in the future they should be much concerned with reducing the proportion of farm tenants. I think that some very advanced legislation will be necessary to bring this about; we have three "land" amendments to the constitution of Kansas, which will be voted on at the next general election. Conditions must be made easier through amendments of the Federal farm loan act for the ambitious young farmer or the industrious tenant who wishes to buy farm or live stock. The way the system operates now it is absolutely impossible for many of them to ever hope to own a farm, as is well shown by the rapid increase in farm tenants. In the older countries the land question has often been met by bloody revolution. I do not believe we will come to this in America, Mr. President, for I have too great a belief in the intelligence of the general public. That is why I look for an encouraging interest in our land problems in the next few years, and as a result of this some legislation which will have a constructive value.

Further, there must be a reconsideration and revision of methods of taxation that will take into view the checking of the tendency toward land speculation which is slowly but surely taking the land out of the reach of young men bred on the farms. The details of such revision are a matter for the most expert advice, but in a broad way the aim should be through the processes of lower taxes on improvements on the land and graded taxation to discourage speculation, the accumulation of land in excessively large holdings, and the further growth of the tenant system. The principle that we have adopted in the income tax of graduating the rate can probably be applied with regard to land occupied by owner as compared with land owned by nonresident speculator, and with regard to large as compared with small popular holdings.

Farmers must have their chance at the brighter things of life; they like good homes the same as city people, and yet the proportion of bath tubs is small. The money has not been available to make the homes modern. I am glad to say that when it does become available on some of the leading farms the home is getting its share. I think this is especially important when we consider that the two greatest assets of any nation are its homes and its agriculture. Both are fundamental, both are essential to the national well-being.

Mr. President, there are many things which must be changed if agriculture is to appeal properly to the younger generation which is now leaving the country in such large numbers. Better schools, modern homes, social advantages, and a greater opportunity to get the brighter things of life are essential. These can be obtained if Congress will consider rural problems with more sympathy, and study the fundamental factors of food production. We need more authoritative information from the Government as to the cost of food production on the farm. Then, too, we must encourage a good roads system that will connect the farms with the market towns and the good schools and churches.

But as a start in a constructive program, let's first eliminate profiteering, encourage cooperation, and take up a study of the land question and taxation. Let's try to stop this landslide from the country into the cities. Let's get a vision of what this great Nation can be, Mr. President, with its industrial and business life working in harmony and perfect cooperation with the agricultural interests, and with plenty of food for everyone, at prices which the workers can afford to pay and yet which will supply modern country homes and other essentials for farmers. If we have the wisdom we can work this out. The food question is fundamental. The Nation's future must be worked out with this in view.

Mr. COMER. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. COMER'S amendment is as follows:

Add after the word "legislation," in line 25, page 90, the following: "That hereafter each lot of cotton classified as tenderable in whole or in part on a section 5 contract of said act as amended, shall give to the buyer the right to demand that one-half of the contract shall be delivered in the official cotton standard grades of the United States from the grades of middling fair, strict good middling, good middling, strict middling, and middling, and that the seller shall have the option of delivering the other half of said contract from any of the official cotton standard grades as established in said act."

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 17, line 17, after the words "cattle ticks," to strike out "$681,160" and insert "$731,160, of which sum $50,000 may be used for live stock and dairy demonstration work, in cooperation with the States Relations Service," so as to make the clause read:

For all necessary expenses for the eradication of southern cattle ticks, $731,160, of which sum $50,000 may be used for live stock and dairy demonstration work, in cooperation with the States Relations Service: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the purchase of animals or in the purchase of materials for or in the construction of dipping vats upon land not owned solely by the United States, except at fairs or expositions where the Department of Agriculture makes exhibits or demonstrations; nor shall any part of this appropriation be used in the purchase of materials or mixtures for use in dipping vats except in experimental or demonstration work carried on by the officials or agents of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have no objection to the appropriation of $50,000 to be used for live stock and dairy demonstration work in those areas of the Southern States which have been freed from the cattle tick, but it seems to me that we are building up a system of confusion here by adding $50,000 for dairy demonstration work upon a cattle-tick appropriation. There it will live from year to year, and get buried in that item, and the administration of cattle-tick appropriation will be confused with the administration of the dairy demonstration, and I am wondering if we can not take care of that in a better way by reducing the item back to $681,000 and appropriating the $50,000 perhaps on the next page, in the item which commences on line 5. I may be mistaken as to the place where it should be put, but let us put the $50,000 for dairy work under the item appropriating for dairy work. It will be found on page 18, line 5, as follows:

For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in dairy industry, cooperative investigations of the dairy industry in the various States, inspection of renovated butter factories and markets, $300,000.

I ask the chairman of the committee if that is not a better place to put the $50,000.

Mr. GRONNA. May I be permitted to read a brief statement from the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. He says:

This appropriation was reduced $52,400 by the House bill. The Senate committee amendment increases the amount by $50,000 and restores the language setting aside $50,000 for live stock and dairy demonstration work in cooperation with the States Relations Service.

The purpose of this amendment is to enable the department to continue its demonstrations in live-stock production and dairying in the South, which have been conducted in cooperation with the States Relations Service during the past four years. The work has proved very beneficial to the areas from which the tick has been eradicated, by demonstrating to the people how they may utilize to the best advantage the benefits derived through the elimination of the pest by the improvement and extension of live stock and dairy industries. This work grows in importance as areas freed of ticks increase from year to year, and there is no doubt that it would be to the best interests of the agriculture of the South, including the stock production and dairying, to continue the appropriation.

Of course, there is a great deal of force to the Senator's argument, but let me say to the Senator that this is what I consider special work. It is not the same class of work that is being done in the dairying work generally. This is to experiment, if I might say so, with dairying in this tick-freed area. I think I am correct in stating that the work is somewhat different from the work that is being carried on in the areas where there has been none of these pests. I think perhaps we might do an injury to the people of the areas where this work has been going on if we make this change. The department is very anxious that this appropriation should remain in the bill. We know that in some portions of the southern country the Department of Agriculture has made great progress, not only in eradicating the tick but in encouraging the industry of dairying. Dairying, as we all know, has been carried on mostly in the Northern States heretofore, but the department has been very helpful, I understand, in promoting dairying in the South, and I believe we ought to leave this amount in this particular bill.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. In just a moment I will yield the floor. I agree with the Senator from New York that it is confusing to have appropriations for the same purpose in more than one place, but I do think this is work somewhat different from the work that is generally carried on in the dairying industry.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I agree with everything the Senator says about the value of this work, but let me say to him—and I think he will acknowledge the truth of the statement—that the dairy problem in the State of Mississippi is not essentially different from the dairy problem in north Texas. A dairy is a dairy wherever you find it. There are certain ways of running a dairy and certain ways of not running it. I assume that the $50,000 is well spent in encouraging the development of the dairy industry in those regions which have been freed from the southern cattle tick. As those vast regions are freed from the southern cattle tick, why can they not be treated like all other regions that were formerly freed from the southern cattle tick, and the dairy work done in those regions just as it is done in the rest of the United States? My suggestion is that this $50,000 item be taken out of this particular appropriation and placed on the next page, where there is special provision "for investigations and experiments in dairy industry, cooperative investigations of the dairy industry in the various States, inspection of renovated-butter factories and markets, $300,000." Make that $350,000, and the department will use that $50,000 where it has been using it before—in the tick-freed areas of the South.

I object to having money appropriated in two, three, or four different parts of this bill, all for the same purpose. It adds to confusion and inevitably it adds to the cost of administration, because somebody is employed in each one of these different bureaus to do work which one man in one bureau alone could do. That is all, Mr. President.

Mr. GRONNA. Unless we specifically provide that at least $50,000 be used for that purpose in the tick-freed country, there might be such a thing as the money not being used.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That would be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. GRONNA. I should have no objection whatever to a transfer of the appropriation, providing it is understood that this $50,000 shall be used in this particular area. We might appropriate a lump sum for the entire country, but our country is enormously large, and there is always great demand from all sections of the country for aid from the States; but if the Senator can agree on a proposition to specify that $50,000 shall be used for this particular purpose, I shall be very glad to have the transfer made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That will be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Idaho rose first, and I promised to yield to him.

Mr. NUGENT. I will say to the Senator that the Senator from New York covered the matter to which it was my intention to call attention.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, I merely want to ask the Senator, the chairman of the committee, if by changing this amount as suggested by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] there is not grave danger that the money will not be used for the purpose specified? As I understand it, this is for demonstration work to show what has been accomplished in the uplifting of the live-stock and dairying industry in those sections where the tick still prevails, showing what has been done in the eradication of the cattle tick, and if that amount is transferred over to the next page and added to the appropriation of $300,000, from the reading of that clause it seems to me the money could be used for other purposes. I for one would be opposed to making the change.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We can put a proviso there.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator from Louisiana that it could be used anywhere, unless we specifically provide that this amount shall be used in the tick-infested area.

Mr. GAY. Under those conditions there would be no occasion to make the change in the wording.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not think so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; there is a most distinct reason for making the change. Dairy industry is not part of cattle-tick eradication, and the two should not be put under one set of men or in one appropriation.

Mr. GAY. But this is to show the benefit that has been derived from the eradication of the cattle tick, and it is certainly for live stock and dairy demonstration work.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then it should be carried under the provision for live stock and dairy demonstration work. I am perfectly willing, on the next page, to make the sum $350,000 and add a proviso that not less than $50,000 of this sum shall be spent in areas freed from cattle tick.

Mr. GRONNA. With that understanding I will have no objection to the change, because that I think would take care of the situation.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the Senator his amendment prepared?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was just writing it. It is to change the figures $300,000 to $350,000 on line 8, page 15, and add a proviso as follows:

Provided, That not less than $50,000 of this sum shall be expended in areas freed from the southern cattle tick.

Mr. HARRISON. Then in the language as embodied on the preceding page——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

In cooperation with the States Relations Service.

Mr. GAY. Why not use the exact language?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is practically provided in the bill, on lines 6 and 7, page 18—

Cooperative investigations of the dairy industry.

Mr. HARRISON. You would not object to having it read "dairy demonstration"?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, not at all; investigations and experiments are demonstrations.

Mr. GAY. On the previous page it does not so provide. It is confined to dairy demonstration work for live stock.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Put that in too. This would involve disagreeing with the committee amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Let us have it reported.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I may recite it again:

Provided, That not less than $50,000 of this sum shall be expended in areas freed from southern cattle tick for live-stock and dairy demonstration work.

Mr. GRONNA. Does the Senator increase the amount?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is increased on line 8.

Mr. HARRISON. In cooperation with the States Relations Service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is surplusage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 17.

Mr. GRONNA. With the understanding that the language proposed by the Senator from New York will be adopted, I ask that we disagree to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. GAY. I suggest that this matter be passed over until put in writing so that it can be reported by the Secretary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On page 18, line 8, strike out "$300,000" and insert "$350,000" and the words "Provided, That not less than $50,000 of this sum shall be expended in areas freed from the southern cattle tick for live-stock and dairy demonstration work."

Mr. GAY. "In cooperation with States Relations Service."

Mr. GRONNA. I think it necessary to change that, if the Senator will modify his amendment. I think the language should be—

Of which sum $50,000 may be used for live-stock demonstration in cooperation with the States Relations Service in the areas freed from the southern cattle tick.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Instead of "not less than $50,000," simply say "$50,000."

Mr. GRONNA. Very well.

Mr. HARRISON. What would the Senator from New York think of the suggestion in line 6, page 18, which would be a matter of surplusage—that is, it would be repetition in the proviso—right after "experiments" to say "and demonstrations in the live-stock and dairy industry."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am perfectly willing to have those words inserted.

Mr. HARRISON. That is repeating what is in the proviso, but the proviso would include what is in there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it makes no difference.

Mr. GRONNA. Let these two amendments go over, so that it will give the Senator from New York time to prepare his amendment in the form that he wants it. I ask that the amendment at the bottom of page 17 and at the top of page 18 go over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be passed over.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I desire at this time to give notice of a motion to suspend a certain rule so I may be in order at the proper time to offer an amendment. I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

NOTICE.

Under and by virtue of the provisions of Rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice that at an early date I shall move to suspend paragraphs 2 and 3 of Rule XVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate for the purpose of offering and proposing to H. R. 12272, being an act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the so-called Agricultural appropriation bill, the following amendment, namely: Add a new section, as follows:

"That for the purpose of carrying on and completing irrigation projects and units thereof heretofore begun or heretofore surveyed, estimated for and approved but not begun for lack of funds, and for the investigation, commencement, and completion of such new projects as may be deemed feasible and desirable to undertake, and that can be completed within the limit of the reclamation fund as increased by the amount herein provided, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated and placed in the reclamation fund, from time to time as estimates are submitted therefor, the sum of $250,000,000 to be expended under the terms and conditions of the act commonly known as the reclamation act and acts amendatory thereof, and to be repaid as is by said act and amendments thereto provided.

"SEC. 2. That in the expenditure of said reclamation fund and in the undertaking of new projects the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to enter into such agreements for cooperation with States, counties, duly authorized irrigation districts and municipalities as he may deem wise and advantageous."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have been examining the rules of the Senate and am convinced that although the proposed amendment is the language of a bill that has been reported favorably from a standing committee of the Senate it nevertheless would be obnoxious to Rule XVI, and in order to become subject to a vote the rules would have to be suspended.

A word of explanation about this proposed amendment. It will be observed that it is simply the Jones bill, that is to say it is the exact form of the bill introduced by the able Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], which proposes to appropriate or lend, rather, to the reclamation fund $250,000,000. That Senator has prepared the bill with much care and I never have any hesitancy about adopting and supporting a meritorious bill when I see it.

There has been a favorable report submitted to the Senate by the able Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], being report No. 335, showing the propriety, the feasibility, aye, sir, the necessity for such legislation. Although the figures $250,000,000 make a large, round mouthful, only $10,000,000 would be available or used this year, and the remaining portion would be used during the next 10 years. I do not hesitate to say that of all the legislation which this Congress shall enact, the bill proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and which has been reported favorably from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] is the most valuable and the most constructive, and it simply follows out a policy which was adopted by Congress when, on June 17, 1902, the reclamation policy took life.

The hour is late, and I do not want to harass the industrious chairman of the committee by any further discussion of this amendment at this time, but will simply point out at an appropriate time that of the moneys that have been advanced by the Government, to wit, $154,000,000, nearly $35,000,000 have been repaid, and that the repayments only began within the last four years. If the Federal Government will lend its aid to the Western States there will soon be no deserts in the West; there will no longer be any cacti to lift spiny limbs into the heated air, for the deserts will be transformed into orange groves; into vineyards; where the purple grapes grow, the olives and the grapefruit flourish.

So I hope at the appropriate time to secure a two-thirds vote for the adding of this amendment to the bill, because I am convinced it would be obnoxious to a point of order unless the rules are suspended. Although it has been reported favorably from a standing committee of the Senate, it carries with it general legislation, and in my judgment the rule would be required to be suspended. I am now laying down the premise for a short speech I am going to make in a few days urging this appropriation.

I beg of Senators not to permit the large figures of $250,000,000 to frighten them. Only $10,000,000 will be needed the first year.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I merely want to emphasize what the Senator from Arizona has said with reference to the amendment proposed by him. It does not involve the appropriation of $250,000,000 now. It simply involves the expenditure of $250,000,000, as he stated, in about 10 years. Every dollar of it will be paid back to the Treasury of the United States. That has been demonstrated by the experience in connection with the reclamation act, as will be shown, I think, by the report to which the Senator referred, made by the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

I simply want to add to what he so well said, that the Government could not make an appropriation that would be of more benefit and more substantial benefit to the country than to act along that line. I am glad the Senator has proposed the amendment. I noticed that some of the Senators present rather had a smile on their faces when the suggestion was made that we should suspend the rule. Possibly they are not in favor of suspending the rules to do a good thing like this, but I hope they will reconsider it and will feel that it is absolutely justified.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator, if the Senate should suspend the rule and incorporate this provision in the bill, does the Senator think the steering committee of the Republican Party of the other House would acquiesce in it and allow the House to accept it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say that I am not concerned about what the steering committee of the House of Representatives would do with reference to a matter of this kind. I am not governing my actions here by what the steering committee of the House would be disposed to do one way or the other. I would act upon this proposition, as I do upon all other propositions, in the way I believe to be right from the standpoint of the public good.

Mr. HARRISON. That is a very proper way. The thing that prompts me to ask that question is the fact that the steering committee of the House required the Committee on Agriculture to reduce the appropriation bill from the estimate of about $37,000,000 to $30,000,000, and I am fearful that they would not want to see incorporated in it a new proposition appropriating $250,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let us not allow our fears to control our actions as to what the steering committee of another body will do.

Mr. HARRISON. I will not be influenced by it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am sure the Senator will not be. Furthermore, I want to again emphasize that this is not an appropriation of $250,000,000. It is an authorization, so that a program of development can be laid down and carried out over a period of 10 or 15 years.

Mr. ASHURST. I have here a copy of a letter, and ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD as an appendix to my remarks. This letter is from the Interior Department, addressed to myself, under date of September 10, 1919. It contains some figures which disclose the fact that under the reclamation law signed by President Roosevelt on the 17th of June, 1902, $154,127,905 have been advanced, and that although the Western States have only started to repay the money to the Federal Treasury, the sum of $35,703,922 has already been repaid within that four years. I ask that the entire table be incorporated into the RECORD. I thank the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter and table referred to are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES RECLAMATION SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., September 10, 1919.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In accordance with telephone request from your office I am sending herewith a tabulation of investments in Government reclamation projects up to the close of the past fiscal year. This shows in each case the total investment of the United States and the reimbursement and other credits against these investments and the net investment on that date.

These are the figures you want, as I understand it, but there is a word of caution in connection with any such statistics. The operations involved in the construction and management of large irrigation projects are so varied that it is difficult or impossible to express all of the financial facts in a few simple terms. For example, the figures given for total investments include actual cash disbursements from the reclamation fund, appropriations for "increase of compensation," and other special appropriations, such as that of a million dollars for the Elephant Butte Dam by the act of March 4, 1907, for judgments of the Court of Claims, etc. This also includes the agreed value of machinery, equipment, materials, etc., transferred from one project to another, in which case we make book credits and debits of appropriate amounts. For all projects such transfers amount to upward of $7,300,000 in the inclosed statement.

Similarly the column of reimbursements and credits includes the other side of such transfer entries, as well as actual cash collections for construction charges, operation and maintenance repayments, water rentals, and miscellaneous items for the sale of electricity, abandoned equipment, etc.

At the bottom of the table you will notice a number of other items added to bring the figures in agreement with our book totals. The "secondary projects" include the great number of possibilities that have been surveyed and examined more or less completely, in addition to the projects actually undertaken. For example, in Arizona this includes the San Carlos, San Pedro, Sentinel, and other propositions that will occur to you.

Jackson Lake, in Wyoming, we converted into a reservoir for one of our constructed projects. Later the storage was enlarged mainly for the benefit of private projects in the same drainage basin, and the companies thus interested deposited in advance the funds used in this later construction. These were deposited to the credit of the reclamation fund and disbursed in the usual manner. The account has not been finally closed out, and there is a small balance remaining to the credit of these companies, which accounts for the item marked "deduct" in tabulation.

The item of general expense includes headquarters offices at Washington and Denver, legal services, and many other items which can not readily be allocated to particular projects except in bulk from time to time on the basis of expenditures or other similar criterion.

This is the largest item included under the head of "Transfers," already mentioned.

The item entitled "Indian projects" represents expenditures from the reclamation fund reimbursed by the Indian Bureau.

I hope the inclosed tabulation and this explanation will give you what you want. If not, and I can give you any further information, please let me know.

Very truly, yours, A. P. DAVIS, Director.

Reclamation project investments to June 30, 1919.

[1] Deduct.

Mr. GAY. Will the Senator from Arizona permit a question?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. GAY. I wish to ask the Senator from Arizona a question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield for a question.

Mr. GAY. I wish to ask the Senator from Arizona if it is his intention to include not only the irrigation projects but the projects involving reclamation by drainage?

Mr. ASHURST. I should have no objection to that; I should consent to any modification of my amendment that would effectuate such a purpose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, after consultation with the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Mississippi, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk in conjunction with the understanding that the committee amendment on page 17 will be disagreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 18, line 8, it is proposed to strike out "$300,000" and to insert "$350,000" and to add:

Provided, That $50,000 of this sum may be expended in areas freed of southern cattle ticks for live-stock and dairy demonstration work in cooperation with the States Relations Service.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not think it would be necessary, perhaps, but in view of the fact that we have added the proviso that $50,000 of the $350,000 may be expended as stated in the amendment, it would seem to me that the body of the provision should not only provide for investigations and experiments, but that, on line 6, after the word "experiments," the words "and demonstrations" should be added; also, in line 6, after the word "in" and before "dairy industry," the words "live stock and" should be included, for the reason that the amount appropriated applies only to investigations and experiments, and we have added to the clause a proviso that allows the carrying on of demonstration work. It would seem to me, if the proviso is going to carry that language, that the body of the provision should also carry the same language.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi offer his suggestion as an amendment?

Mr. GRONNA. I trust the Senator from Mississippi will not ask to have the language changed. The $300,000 is to be used exclusively for the purpose specified in this particular language.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand, Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. We specify in the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] specifically for what purpose $50,000 shall be used. I should be opposed to changing the provision so that the money could be expended, you might say, altogether for demonstration work. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not insist upon his amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. It is not my intention to do that. I wish to clarify it, for I am afraid that some one else might interpret the provision exactly as the Senator from North Dakota has interpreted it. If I understand the Senator, the amount of $300,000 as embodied in the bill has been increased to $350,000?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. In other words, if the proviso were not inserted it would read:

For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in dairy industry, * * * $300,000.

But after the proviso is inserted, demonstration work is provided for.

Mr. GRONNA. For that purpose $50,000 is provided.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; $50,000.

Mr. GRONNA. But not $350,000.

Mr. HARRISON. It seems to me the body of the provision ought to contain the words "demonstration work," so that the proviso might be included.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that, as one member of the committee, I can not accept that amendment, because we have large amounts appropriated for demonstration work. This is for dairying.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Appropriations have been made for demonstration work in other parts of the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Appropriations have been made in other parts of the bill for such work.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from North Dakota does not want to understand me as desiring more than $50,000 to carry on this work.

Mr. GRONNA. I understand the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want any more. I am afraid, however, that, as the proviso includes demonstration work, which is not included in the body of the paragraph, it might be construed against the appropriation in some way. I can not see where it would hurt anything to add "and demonstration work" after "investigations and experiments," for there can not be spent over $50,000 in carrying on the demonstration work; it is expressly limited to $50,000.

Mr. GRONNA. I understood the Senator to desire to change the language in the original bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; on line 6, merely to add "and demonstration work."

Mr. GRONNA. I hope the Senator will not ask that that be done.

Mr. HARRISON. I am merely seeking to perfect the text; that is all I am trying to do.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] be stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from New York has been agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I understand that; but may we not have it read for the information of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York, which has been agreed to, will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 18, line 8, it is proposed to strike out "$300,000" and to insert "$350,000: Provided, That $50,000 of this sum may be expended in areas freed of southern cattle ticks for live stock and dairy demonstration work in cooperation with the States Relations Service."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am not going to insist on my suggestion; I merely thought it would be better to perfect the text.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask if amendments by individual Senators to the bill are now in order?

Mr. GRONNA. It was agreed that the committee amendments should first be considered.

Mr. THOMAS. I so understood, but it appears from the discussion that amendments are being offered from the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. The only reason for that was that we were trying to transpose an item reported as a committee amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I was merely endeavoring to find out what the procedure was.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been agreed that committee amendments shall be first considered. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 18, line 16, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$269,180" and insert "$282,820," so as to read:

For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in animal husbandry; for experiments in animal feeding and breeding, including cooperation with the State agricultural experiment stations, including repairs and additions to and erection of buildings absolutely necessary to carry on the experiments, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and all other necessary expenses, $282,820.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, in line 17, after "$282,820," to strike out "Provided, That of the sum thus appropriated $20,000 may be used for experiments in the breeding and maintenance of horses for military purposes."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not know whether there are any lovers of the horse left in the Senate. I think I may say the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is one and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], I am sure, is one, and I presume there are some others.

Mr. SMOOT. The two Senators from Louisiana ought to be.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will not call the roll of Senators on this question; but the amendment reported by the committee wipes out all the work of the Department of Agriculture in connection with the development of saddle horses in the United States.

There are two stations now being operated by the Department of Agriculture which have been operated for some time. One is in Vermont and one, until recently, at least, was in Colorado, although, perhaps, it is now in Wyoming. The denial of this appropriation, of course, will close both of those stations and will compel the Government to discharge its employees and get rid of the horses. I think it is pretty ungrateful treatment of our good old friend, the horse. So far as I can see he is the one animal now that the United States Government does not care a rap about. We take care of the other friends of man—the cattle, the sheep, and the hogs—but not of the horse.

Mr. President, it is a fact that while these two stations are not large, going concerns, and were never intended to be, they have possibilities of a great deal of good in them. They were established, in the first instance, as I recollect, to work out, in connection with the Army authorities, some plan for increasing the supply of cavalry horses in the United States. The supply of artillery horses is more than adequate; indeed, the tremendous number of horses required in the recent war for artillery purposes scarcely scratched the surface of our supply of such horses; but the supply of cavalry horses, or horses suitable for cavalry, is steadily diminishing, and our Government has a great deal of trouble in finding horses of a suitable type for that branch of the service. That trouble is going to increase from time to time.

The station in Vermont is engaged in an effort to restore and perpetuate the Morgan breed of horses. A very famous horse was the old Morgan of Vermont and northern New England, whose blood spread far over the country—a horse of medium weight and of tremendous endurance, and most excellent disposition. Henry Ford and the Buicks and the other quantity producers of jitneys have pretty nearly driven out the medium-sized horse. The lightweight horse still lives on the cattle ranges, and is used for handling cattle, but the medium-weight horse, which is suitable for saddle purposes and for cavalry purposes, is being driven to the wall. It seems to me that it is an unwise thing for the Government to give up all efforts toward perpetuating a most valuable animal in the United States.

The station in the Rocky Mountain States—I think it is in Colorado—has made experiments along several lines of breeding, using the thoroughbred and the standard-bred trotter, and I think it made the awful mistake on one occasion of trying a hackney. I understand that effort has been abandoned; but the effort has been made there to establish and encourage the breeding of types of horses that can be used for saddle purposes and especially for cavalry.

The amount of money involved is only $20,000, and it seems to me rather shortsighted deliberately to cut it all out and destroy the work that has been done, and say, "We will have none of it." On behalf of my friend, the horse, I plead with the Senate for the restoration of the item.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I just want to offer a word of testimony in support of the statements so well made by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

It seems an inopportune time to take this step, calculated to discourage entirely the production of this type of a very useful animal, for the reason, as the Senator has pointed out, that while it is possible to secure an unlimited number of almost every other kind of horse that can be named, it is very difficult even now for the Government to supply its own wants with this particular type of horse.

This action on the part of the committee at the present time is in striking contrast with the attitude of the Government in other departments, particularly the Bureau of Indian Affairs. They are doing exactly the reverse of what the Government is doing elsewhere; and it is needless to say that the selection of these stations has been made with the very best judgment in regard to the places where the horses can be produced to the best advantage. It seems to me highly unwise to terminate, without any regard to the consequences, this effort that has been so well started.

I hope the Senator's motion will prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that this item may be passed over for to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? If not, the item will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 19, line 9, after the word "products," to strike out "$106,400" and insert "$139,800," and in line 10, after the word "sum," to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$47,720," so as to make the clause read:

For all necessary expenses for scientific investigations in diseases of animals, including the maintenance and improvement of the bureau experiment station at Bethesda, Md., and the necessary alterations of buildings thereon, and the necessary expenses for investigations of tuberculin, serums, antitoxins, and analogous products, $139,800: Provided, That of said sum $47,720 may be used for researches concerning the cause, modes of spread, and methods of treatment and prevention of the disease of contagious abortion of animals.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 18, after the word "authorities," to strike out "$410,000" and insert "$641,045," and in line 20, before the words "be available," to strike out "shall" and insert "may," so as to make the clause read:

For investigating the disease of hog cholera, and for its control or eradication by such means as may be necessary, including demonstrations, the formation of organizations, and other methods, either independently or in cooperation with farmers' associations, State or county authorities, $641,045: Provided, That of said sum $188,280 may be available for expenditure in carrying out the provisions of the act approved March 4, 1913, regulating the preparation, sale, barter, exchange, or shipment of any virus, serum, toxin, or analogous product manufactured in the United States and the importation of such products intended for use in the treatment of domestic animals: And provided further, That of said sum $29,520 shall be available for researches concerning the cause, modes of spread, and methods of treatment and prevention of this disease.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 11, after the words "general expenses," to strike out "$3,678,266" and insert "$4,190,791," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $4,190,791.

Mr. GRONNA. Let that item of the totals go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 21, after the words "Animal Industry," to strike out "$5,327,236" and insert "$5,736,581," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Animal Industry, $5,736,581.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This total also will be passed over, without objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the subhead "Bureau of Plant Industry," on page 21, line 7, before the word "clerks," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "seventeen" and insert "eighteen"; in line 8, before the word "clerks," to strike out "five" and insert "fifteen"; in line 9, before the word "clerks," where it occurs the first time, to strike out "twenty-eight" and insert "forty-three"; in line 10, before the word "clerks," where it occurs the first time, to strike out "eighty-six" and insert "eighty-nine"; in line 13, after the word "each," to strike out "forty-three clerks, at $900 each; one clerk or draftsman, $900"; in line 15, before the word "messengers," to strike out "forty-four" and insert "fifty-three"; on page 22, line 12, before the words "messenger boys," to strike out "three" and insert "five"; in line 14, after the word "each," to strike out "five messenger boys, at $420 each; sixteen messenger boys, at $360 each"; and in line 16, after the words "in all," to strike out "$526,960" and insert "$528,500," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, Bureau of Plant Industry: One physiologist and pathologist, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 assistant to the chief, $3,000; 1 executive assistant in seed distribution, $2,500; 1 officer in charge of publications, $2,250; 1 landscape gardener, $1,800; 1 officer in charge of records, $2,250; 1 executive clerk, $2,000; 4 executive clerks, at $1,980 each; 1 seed inspector, $1,000; 1 seed warehouseman, $1,400; 1 seed warehouseman, $1,000; 12 clerks, class 4; 18 clerks, class 3; 15 clerks, at $1,500 each; 43 clerks, class 2; 3 clerks, at $1,320 each; 89 clerks, class 1; 2 clerks or draftsmen, at $1,200 each; 2 clerks, at $1,100 each; 5 clerks, at $1,080 each; 7 clerks, at $1,020 each; 30 clerks, at $1,000 each; 11 clerks, at $840 each; 1 laborer, $780; 53 messengers or laborers, at $720 each; 8 messengers or laborers, at $660 each; 17 messengers or laborers, at $600 each; 1 artist, $1,620; 1 clerk or artist, $1,400; 2 clerks or artists, at $1,200 each; 2 laboratory aids, at $1,440 each; 1 laboratory aid, $1,380; 4 laboratory aids or clerks, at $1,200 each; 1 laboratory aid, clerk, or skilled laborer, $1,080; 3 laboratory aids, clerks, or skilled laborers, at $1,020 each; 2 laboratory aids, at $960 each; 2 laboratory aids, at $900 each; 6 laboratory aids, at $840 each; 7 laboratory aids, at $720 each; 1 map tracer or laboratory aid, $900; 2 gardeners, at $1,440 each; 4 gardeners, at $1,200 each; 8 gardeners, at $1,100 each; 15 gardeners, at $900 each; 19 gardeners, at $780 each; 1 skilled laborer, $1,100; 1 skilled laborer, $960; 2 skilled laborers, at $900 each; 3 skilled laborers, at $840 each; 1 assistant in technology, $1,400; 1 assistant in technology, $1,380; 1 general mechanic, $1,400; 1 mechanician, $1,080; 1 mechanical assistant, $1,400; 1 mechanical assistant, $1,200; 1 carpenter, $900; 1 painter, $900; 1 teamster, $840; 21 messengers or laborers, at $540 each; 29 messengers or laborers, at $480 each; 5 messenger boys, at $660 each; 14 messenger boys, at $600 each; 10 messenger boys, at $480 each; 4 charwomen, at $480 each; 21 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $528,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 14, after the word "fruits," to strike out "$80,935" and insert "$90,935," so as to make the clause read:

For the investigation of diseases of orchard and other fruits, $90,935: Provided, That $8,000 of said amount shall be available for the investigation of diseases of the pecan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 3, after "$86,410," to strike out "Provided, That not more than $7,500 of this sum may be used for experiments in cottonseed interbreeding," so as to make the clause read:

For acclimatization and adaptation investigations of cotton, corn, and other crops introduced from tropical regions, and for the improvement of cotton and other fiber plants by cultural methods, breeding, and selection, and for determining the feasibility of increasing the production of hard fibers outside of the continental United States, $86,410.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I move to strike out "$86,410" and to insert in lieu thereof "$111,410." I do this for the purpose of providing a sum to take care of the last installment in a project adopted by Congress two or three years ago at the instance of the Department of Agriculture. The chairman of the committee will recall the fact.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator defer that until the committee amendments have been adopted?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall be glad to have the matter go over until later, if that is desired by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, as I understand, this item is passed over without prejudice.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has reference to the committee amendment on lines 4 and 5, page 26?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. The Senator from Texas has offered an amendment increasing the amount and also striking out the proviso, as I understand.

Mr. SHEPPARD. No.

Mr. GRONNA. The proviso has been stricken out by the committee.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am not so much interested in the proviso as I am in having the amount of $86,410 increased by the sum of $25,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the amendment of the Senator from Texas does not relate to the committee amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It may be that the committee amendment will have some bearing on the motion I have made, and if the chairman does not object, I should be glad to have the two matters go over until we can determine the question.

Mr. GRONNA. I have no objection to letting the item go over, if it is desired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 26, line 9, after the word "investigations," to strike out "$59,820" and insert "$39,820," so as to make the clause read:

For the investigation, testing, and improvement of plants yielding drugs, spices, poisons, oils, and related products and by-products, and for general physiological and fermentation investigations, $39,820.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, after line 11, to strike out:

For biophysical investigations in connection with the various lines of work herein authorized, $32,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 25, to strike out "$36,680" and insert "$41,680," so as to make the clause read:

For studying and testing commercial seeds, including the testing of samples of seeds of grasses, clover, or alfalfa, and lawn-grass seeds secured in the open market, and where such samples are found to be adulterated or misbranded the results of the tests shall be published, together with the names of the persons by whom the seeds were offered for sale, and for carrying out the provisions of the act approved August 24, 1912, entitled "An act to regulate foreign commerce by prohibiting the admission into the United States of certain adulterated grain and seeds unfit for seeding purposes" (37 Stat. L., p. 506), $41,680.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 6, after the word "production," to strike out "$212,505" and insert "$359,705," and in line 9, after the words "stripe rust," to insert: "Provided also, That $147,200 shall be set aside for the location of and destruction of the barberry bushes and other vegetation from which such rust spores originate," so as to make the clause read:

For the investigation and improvement of cereals and methods of cereal production, and the study of cereal diseases, and for the investigation of the cultivation and breeding of flax for seed purposes, including a study of flax diseases, and for the investigation and improvement of broom corn and methods of broom-corn production, $359,705: Provided, That $50,000 shall be set aside for the investigation and control of the diseases of wheat, oats, and barley known as black rust, leaf rust, and stripe rust: Provided also, That $147,200 shall be set aside for the location of and destruction of the barberry bushes and other vegetation from which such rust spores originate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that this item go over until I can see the chairman regarding it. The cut of $80,000 there affects two or three cereal experimentations in certain parts of Texas and Oklahoma.

Mr. GRONNA. I have no objection to letting it go over, if the Senator desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 7, after the word "agriculture," to strike out "$85,000" and insert "$94,115," so as to make the clause read:

For sugar-plant investigations, including studies of diseases and the improvement of the beet and beet seed, and methods of culture, and to determine for each sugar-beet area the agricultural operations required to insure a stable agriculture, $94,115.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 12, after the word "conditions," to strike out "$150,000" and insert "$159,000," so as to make the clause read:

For the investigation and improvement of methods of crop production under subhumid, semiarid, or dry-land conditions, $159,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used in the free distribution, or propagation for free distribution, of cuttings, seedlings, or trees of willow, box elder, ash, caragana, or other common varieties of fruit, ornamental, or shelter-belt trees in the Northern Great Plains area, except for experimental or demonstration purposes in the States of North and South Dakota west of the one-hundredth meridian, and in Montana and Wyoming east of the 5,000-foot contour line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 25, after the word "regions," to strike out "$52,380" and insert "$73,580," so as to make the clause read:

For investigations in connection with western irrigation agriculture, the utilization of lands reclaimed under the reclamation act, and other areas in the arid and semiarid regions, $73,580.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, line 2, after the word "subjects," to strike out "$71,940" and insert "$86,940," so as to make the clause read:

For horticultural investigations, including the study of producing and harvesting truck and related crops, including potatoes, and, in cooperation with the Bureau of Markets, studies of the behavior of vegetables while in the processes of marketing and in commercial storage, and the study of landscape and vegetable gardening, floriculture, and related subjects, $86,940.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, line 22, after the word "country," to strike out "$82,700" and insert "$92,700," so as to make the clause read:

For investigations in foreign seed and plant introduction, including the study, collection, purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of rare and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries and from our possessions, and for experiments with reference to their introduction and cultivation in this country, $92,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 13, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$2,098,063" and insert "$2,272,078," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $2,272,078.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that the Secretary may be authorized to change the totals wherever it is necessary.

The next amendment was, on page 31, after line 13, to strike out:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For purchase, propagation, testing, and congressional distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, postal cards, gas, electric current, rent outside of the District of Columbia, official traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same; for repairs and the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $239,416. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend the said sum, as nearly as practicable, in the purchase, testing, and distribution of such valuable seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, the best he can obtain at public or private sale, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned, and in which same are to be distributed as hereinafter stated, and such seeds so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, after due advertisement and on competitive bids, is authorized to award the contract for the supplying of printed packets and envelopes and the packeting, assembling, and mailing of the seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, or any part thereof, for a period of not more than five years nor less than one year, if by such action he can best protect the interests of the United States. An equal proportion of five-sixths of all seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, shall upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture, that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents, or mailed by the department upon the receipt of their addressed franks, in packages of such weight as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General may jointly determine: Provided, however, That upon each envelope or wrapper containing packages of seeds the contents thereof shall be plainly indicated, and the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each Member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents: Provided also, That the seeds allotted to Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery not later than the 10th day of January: Provided also, That any portion of the allotments to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress remaining uncalled for on the 1st day of April shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress and who have not before during the same season been supplied by the department: And provided also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, mulberry and other rare and valuable trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over, Mr. President.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask just one question in regard to the amendment? Was the committee unanimous in its recommendation in regard to that?

Mr. GRONNA. Of course there are a good many members of the committee here. As far as I remember, the committee was unanimous, unless it was the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. I was not present at the time the vote was taken. I happened to be on the committee to attend the funeral of the late Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. GRONNA. I will say, in answer to the Senator from Ohio, that not only were the members of the committee who were present unanimous in striking this item out, but the new Secretary of Agriculture wrote a lengthy letter advocating the abolishment of the congressional distribution of seeds. This item carries nearly $240,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply ask that it go over for to-night.

Mr. HARRISON. I, too, was going to make that request, because I want a record vote on the proposition, and I do not care to demand it this afternoon.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply want to express a hope that Senators will consider this matter carefully. I believe that it is not only a waste of money to appropriate this large amount for seeds, but we should take into consideration the fact that we are carrying that tremendous amount of merchandise by mail, instead of letting the seeds go by freight. We are here paying out $240,000 for seeds, and we are perhaps paying out more money than that for the transportation of them by mail. It seems to me, Mr. President, that it is indefensible.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the nomination of Hon. William Martin Williams, of Alabama, to be Commissioner of Internal Revenue, I desire to have acted upon to-day if possible, and I am going to ask the Senator having the bill in charge if he has any objection to an executive session?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is understood that the amendment which has just been reached will go over.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, we are considering the Agricultural appropriation bill. It is a farmers' measure, and as a rule on the farm we are used to working later than 5 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. We have plenty of work to do yet, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, I have no objection to an executive session, whenever the Senate desires it.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. GRONNA. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 24, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 23, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Infinite and Eternal Spirit, from whom all blessings flow, through whose divine guidance and gracious providence we have been brought as individuals and as a Nation to the present hour, we come, giving Thee hearty thanks for all the manifestations of Thy love, praying that Thou wilt continue the same, that we may fulfill to the uttermost our destiny here in this world, and by its discipline be prepared for whatever awaits us in the great beyond. This we ask in the name and spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COLIN M. SELPH, POSTMASTER AT ST. LOUIS, MO.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, on the 1st of March certain papers and documents relating to the official conduct of the postmaster at St. Louis were introduced, and by the House referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. That committee have examined those papers. We came to the conclusion that the Post Office Committee has no jurisdiction to inquire into the matter. The fact that a man happens to be postmaster does not give that committee jurisdiction. The committee has jurisdiction to legislate on matters concerning the post office and post roads, and to recommend appropriations——

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. What is the object of the gentleman in addressing the House? Is it to make a speech or a request?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; I simply present a report, that the committee have directed me to report these papers back with the recommendation that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GARNER. Well, but, Mr. Speaker, this is a matter referred to the Post Office Committee in the due process of the proceedings of the House. Now, if it is going to be taken away from that committee and sent to the Judiciary Committee, it must come under the regular rule, and I think that is by unanimous consent or by a motion.

Mr. STEENERSON. No; this is the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to move a rereference. Does he do that?

Mr. GARNER. He has a right to move a rereference, but he has no right to make a report and then debate it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The gentleman from Minnesota has no right to debate it, except by consent of the House.

Mr. STEENERSON. I thought I would have to make an explanation as to why we do this.

Mr. GARNER. I will ask the gentleman, if I may, if he has made a motion——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This is all out of order.

Mr. GARNER. This is out of order, and I do not desire to proceed out of order. If the gentleman from Minnesota has a motion to make, I will utilize my rights under that motion.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is no right to debate under that motion.

Mr. GARNER. That may be, but I will avail myself of whatever right I have, if he makes that motion.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the gentleman from Minnesota is making a report from his committee, or that he is offering a motion?

Mr. STEENERSON. I was making a report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked the gentleman if he was going to make a motion to rerefer.

Mr. GARNER. He has not done that. He said he was making a report, and I make the point of order that a written report from the committee is not in order under the circumstances, and I would like to have a ruling on that.

Mr. GARD. May we have the motion read?

The SPEAKER. Is the report in writing?

Mr. STEENERSON. The report is in writing. I supposed it was privileged.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is a privileged motion to move to rerefer to the Committee on the Judiciary. After a report is made by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads it is not in order to send it to the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the Clerk to read the report. The Chair thinks it is in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEENERSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition (Exhibit A) signed by Joseph Dixon and 19 other citizens of the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, charging Colin M. Selph, the duly appointed and acting postmaster of the city of St. Louis, a United States post office of the first class, with certain high crimes and misdemeanors in office, therein specified and set forth, and which, if found to be true, constitute grounds for impeachment, together with a petition (Exhibit B) signed by Joseph Dixon and other citizens of the city of St. Louis, in support of said charges, and a further petition (Exhibit C) signed by Robert J. Ebrecht and other citizens of the city of St. Louis, report the same back with the recommendation that said charges and papers be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with directions to investigate the same and take such action as may be proper in the premises.

Mr. GARNER. Now, Mr. Speaker, do I understand the Chair to say that he holds that that report is in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman has a right to move a change of reference.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; but, Mr. Speaker, I did not make a point of order against his making the motion for a change of reference. I made a point of order against this report; and I submit, if the Chair will permit, that this recommendation of the committee in the report is not to transfer the matter to the Judiciary Committee, but it is to instruct the Judiciary Committee to make an investigation. Now, if that report is in order, of course any committee having a bill sent to it can report it back to the House with any character of report it desires to make, with instructions to transfer it to another committee and for that committee to make certain investigations, and so forth, and so on, which I think the Chair will conclude is not in order under the rule which gives the right of transfer from one committee to another.

Mr. DYER. I take it that a motion to rerefer the matter from the Post Office Committee to the Judiciary Committee would be in order.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will ask to strike out those last words about instructions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Minnesota, if he so desires, has the right under the instructions of the committee to move to rerefer it.

Mr. GARNER. But, Mr. Speaker, I insist that the Chair shall rule upon my point of order. I think the notes of the official reporter will show that the Chair held that it was in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think that he was in error in that.

Mr. GARNER. That is all I want to say. Now, Mr. Speaker if I may, let me say that I have no objection to this matter going to the Committee on the Judiciary, where it may have intelligent consideration, but I do suggest to the Chair that if a committee having a bill referred to it is permitted to come in here with a long report in the way of an argument and instructions to another committee, to hold that in order would undoubtedly create a precedent that the Chair, I think, does not want to create.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not intend to do that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the matter may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what, then, becomes of this report that the gentleman has filed? I think the report should not be considered, because while I assume the committee has the right to make the recommendation it clearly has no right to transfer it from the Committee on the Post Office to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STEENERSON. Not without the consent of the House.

Mr. GARD. What becomes of the gentleman's report with the papers?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the report and the papers be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GARD. The original papers—the whole thing.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The whole thing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the report and the papers be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, do we understand that that means that the report, with the matter which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] said that he would like to have stricken out, stricken out of the report, or the report as it is.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It does not have any effect. It has not been agreed to by the House.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did not understand when the matter was before the Committee on the Post Office this morning that we were making any recommendations to investigate this matter, else I should have asked more time to consider it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It does not make any difference, because it will go by unanimous consent to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLACK. But I should object to its going with the recommendation to the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But there is no recommendation from this House.

Mr. BLACK. There is from the committee, something which we did not mean to give.

Mr. STEENERSON. I understood that it was unanimous in the committee that this should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLACK. That is true, and I have no objection to its being referred, but as a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads I do not care to recommend to the Committee on the Judiciary that it investigate these charges, because they may be unworthy of investigation.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Texas that the Committee on the Judiciary would not pay any attention to any recommendation made to it by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in so important a matter as this.

Mr. BLACK. But we do not want to put ourselves in the attitude of making a recommendation, because the charges were not read to the committee.

Mr. DYER. It is not my understanding that any recommendation is made.

Mr. BLACK. But it is made in the language of the report.

Mr. DYER. If it is, it will be entirely ignored under the unanimous-consent agreement. We would not consider it.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would state to the gentleman that the reason the charges were not mentioned——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I object until the report is modified.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota that he withdraw his report.

Mr. STEENERSON. I can not do that. I move that the papers be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would have to make the point of order to that at this stage. The report is now in the hands of the House, these papers are now in the House. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has lost jurisdiction by making a report, and it is not in order now for that committee to move to have the matter recommitted to any other commitee.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us table the report, and let them ask unanimous consent to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, let me get the ruling of the Chair upon the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I think the point of order is correct, but I want to get a ruling upon it, for it is a precedent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has made a report to the House, that report is now before the House and, therefore, the gentleman has exhausted his jurisdiction.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. Under the ruling, would it not be within the province of the Chair to send these papers to whatever committee he might desire to send them to?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They go on the House Calendar.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, this is a report from a committee and it would take the same course of any other report.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to correct the record, and in connection with that I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes in order that I may explain the correction.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I object to that now.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Minnesota wish to do.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is the matter disposed of?

The SPEAKER. The Chair awaits any other motion that is in order.

Mr. STEENERSON. I move to rerefer the matter to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is in order.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Would it not be in order, and would it not be the best way to dispose of the matter, to have the gentleman ask unanimous consent to withdraw his report and then make the motion to rerefer the matter? That would save complications. I suggest that to the gentleman.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the report, and I shall follow that by a motion to rerefer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to withdraw the report. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. If I understand it, the matter now goes to the calendar under the regular rule, after the committee has made a report upon it?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. GARNER. Then I object to it.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes in explanation of a statement made by me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, when the resolution for the investigation of the Board for Vocational Education was before the House on Saturday last, as will be seen on page 4646 of the RECORD, I made the following statement:

> On March 12, during the examination, in the ordinary way I chanced to ask Mr. Littledale a question in respect to his own history. I had no knowledge of him; I had never seen him before then. In answer to my question whether he was a citizen of the United States, he answered that he was not. He is an alien. He is a citizen of Great Britain, although he has been a resident of the United States for 14 years.

This statement refers to Mr. Littledale, the reporter of the Evening Post. On page 4648 of the RECORD, the Gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] subsequently said:

> I might add that it was my question which brought forth the information that the witness was a citizen of England and not of this country, and that he had lived in the United States 14 years and made a living here.

On page 12, part 1, of the hearings of the Committee on Education, under date of March 12, appears the following:

> Mr. SEARS. Where do you live?
> Mr. LITTLEDALE. My home is in South Orange, N. J.
> Mr. DONOVAN. Are you a native of America?
> Mr. LITTLEDALE. No, sir.
> Mr. DONOVAN. Are you a citizen of the United States?
> Mr. LITTLEDALE. No, sir.
> Mr. DONOVAN. Where were you born?
> Mr. LITTLEDALE. Bombay, India.
> Mr. DONOVAN. Of what country are you a citizen?
> Mr. LITTLEDALE. I am a British subject.
> Mr. BRAND. Were you here during the war?
> Mr. LITTLEDALE. No, sir.
> Mr. BRAND. Where were you?
> Mr. LITTLEDALE. In France.
> Mr. BRAND. Were you in the service there?
> Mr. LITTLEDALE. I was driver of a tank.
> Mr. DONOVAN. In the British service or the United States?
> Mr. LITTLEDALE. In the British service.
> Mr. DONOVAN. How long have you been in America?
> Mr. LITTLEDALE. Some 14 years.
> Mr. DONOVAN. What has been your occupation during that period?
> Mr. LITTLEDALE. A writer.

Mr. BLANTON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. BLANTON. First, I have a short letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Meredith, which I ask to insert in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, March 23, 1920.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I think you will be interested in the inclosed copy of a letter which I recently wrote to Senator GRONNA, chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, recommending that the appropriation for the "congressional seed distribution" be eliminated from the bill. It seems to me that this appropriation can well be discontinued in the interest of economy. Certainly the money now devoted to it could be much more advantageously utilized in the prosecution of urgent and important work on problems of crop production. I sincerely hope that the Senate will confirm the action of the Senate committee in striking the item from the bill and that it will be agreed to by the conferees.

I am also taking the liberty of sending you a copy of my letter of March 1 to Senator SMOOT, chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing. May I not call your attention especially to the suggestion that the present edition of the Yearbook, which, as you know, is an annual publication, might well be reduced and that the farmers' bulletins, four-fifths of which are now allotted to Members of Congress, should be handled entirely by the Department of Agriculture. As you perhaps know, only 30,000 copies of the Yearbook are allotted to the department, the remaining 470,000 copies being distributed through Members of Congress. If only a few thousand copies were issued, as suggested in my letter, a considerable saving could be effected. So far as the farmers' bulletins are concerned, I am convinced that much better results would be secured if the matter of their distribution were placed entirely under the control of the department. Under the present arrangement, when four-fifths of the bulletins are available to Members of Congress, it is possible for the department to comply with only a very small portion of the demand for them. I do not know what action the Joint Committee on Printing will take with reference to these matters, but I sincerely hope that the recommendations I have made will receive favorable consideration. Our appropriation for printing is carried in the sundry civil bill, which has not yet been reported out by the House Committee on Appropriations:

Very truly, yours,
E. T. MEREDITH,
Secretary.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the matter spoken of by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DONOVAN], I ask permission to proceed for one minute to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from New York had only read further from the hearings before the Committee on Education of March 12, 1920, part 1, page 13, the following would appear:

> Mr. BLANTON. You have been here 14 years. Do you expect to remain here permanently?
> Mr. LITTLEDALE. Some personal questions are involved in that.
> Mr. BLANTON. I want to find what your intentions are. If a man lives here 14 years and does not take out citizenship papers, it does affect his standing in this country in a certain respect. Do you expect to become a citizen of the United States.
> Mr. LITTLEDALE. Yes, sir.
> Mr. BLANTON. You have been living here 14 years without taking out any papers.

And again let me quote from page 14:

> Mr. DONOVAN. I forgot to ask you, Mr. Littledale, are you a married man?
> Mr. LITTLEDALE. No, sir.
> Mr. DONOVAN. I wondered if you had your family here. Are your parents here.
> Mr. LITTLEDALE. No, sir.
> Mr. BLANTON. But you have been making a living in the United States for 14 years and you have not thought enough of the flag to either fight for it or take out citizenship papers.

And note following from part 2, hearings of March 13, 1920:

> Mr. LITTLEDALE. I say the record leaves out an answer to the question of Mr. BLANTON: "You have been making a living in the United States of America for 14 years and yet you do not think enough of the flag of this country to either fight for it or to take out your citizenship papers." No reply is given. That is an omission, I say, in the record.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the gentlemen should proceed in his own way and make it clear. It is a pretty strong accusation against a man that he has remained in this country 14 years and making a living in it, and not be willing to take out citizenship papers or fight. No one should assert that his answer to that charge is not in the record, when he answered it specifically.

The gentleman from New York will admit that in that very record the question arose in the committee where Mr. Littledale asked for his answer to be inserted in reply to my question where I asked him if he had not been living in this country for 14 years and had made a living here and had never taken out his first papers for citizenship.

Mr. DONOVAN. That is true.

Mr. BLANTON. And I asked him that question.

Mr. DONOVAN. No; the gentleman did not ask that question; he made the statement.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the governor of New Mexico announcing the ratification of the amendment to the Constitution relating to suffrage for women.

RANK OF ARMY NURSES.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to strike H. R. 2492, granting rank to Army nurses, from the Calendar of Motions to Discharge Committees, as the provisions in the bill have been included in the Army reorganization bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not now recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Fess bill, amending the zone postal laws, containing my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13108, the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MANN of Illinois in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read the title.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee arose yesterday there was pending an amendment to the proviso on page 28, to which amendment the gentleman from Texas made a point of order. Does the gentleman from Texas wish to be heard on his point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order because I do not think the amount is too large.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN] moved to increase the amount in line 17, page 28, from 30 cents to 50 cents. In my judgment there is no necessity for making the change, and probably the motion is made under a misapprehension as to what the present situation is.

The fact is that the boys who are in the naval prisons are given the regular Navy rations; whatever is given to other enlisted men they get. This is a provision that has been carried in the law for a long time, which in certain cases would permit the commutation of rations for cash. My understanding is that it was necessary because of the fact that we did not at one time have naval prisons with a sufficient capacity to take care of all the prisoners. We had to have some boys confined in State penitentiaries, and in order to pay for their keep in the State institutions this provision was carried. It does not in any way affect the boys in the prisons in the Navy now. They get the regular Navy rations. This does not apply except when they are in some situation which makes it advisable to commute the rations for cash. Therefore I do not think it would be advisable to change the amount. Nobody has ever made any complaint about it and no one has ever made any recommendation in regard to it. There is no grievance, and I see no reason for making the change.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, now here is the proposition. My amendment does not hurt the situation, because it says that it shall not exceed 50 cents per day.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. When any officer or enlisted man commutes a ration in the Navy it is done on the basis of 40 cents. This increases the possibility of paying State penitentiaries 50 cents instead of 30 cents.

Mr. MCKEOWN. I will say to the gentleman that an unfortunate prisoner has no opportunity to be heard, and for that reason there are probably no complaints coming to the committee, but I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. PADGETT. If the gentleman will yield to let me explain. Prisoners are fed whether it costs 50 cents, 75 cents, or a dollar a day to feed them. They get the Navy ration regardless of cost. This 30 cents only applies when they are sent to a State penitentiary or some other prison and they pay that for their support during their confinement. So it does not affect a prisoner in our prisons.

Mr. HUSTED. Does the gentleman think that 30 cents is the proper amount to provide in case they are confined in some institution, considering prevailing prices?

Mr. PADGETT. We have heard no complaints. If there had been complaint, we would have heard.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. If any State prison is paying more for the care of these boys than it is getting out of it, I imagine the Federal Government would have heard of it long ago.

Mr. MCKEOWN. I just want to say this to the committee. I offered this amendment because during the war I had a circumstance that came to my attention that showed what 30 cents will not do. Some men were ordered to report to go abroad from halfway across the continent, and the officers figured that it would take five days' time to make the trip, and the men were given the munificent sum of $1.50 to buy food while making the trip. If it had not been for friends who contributed to their wants and necessities, these men would have gone hungry. Now, if you increase the allowance of midshipmen to $1.08, I see no reason why the provision which we are writing here as a law at this time should not be changed to give 50 cents allowance to a prisoner, however unfortunate he may be. Some of these prisoners are the sons of some good citizens of the United States and some of the heavy taxpayers of the United States, and while those prisoners in charge of the Navy get the full naval ration, why should there be objection to saying it shall not exceed 50 cents when——

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield? Will the gentleman tell me why the Federal Government should pay a State prison 50 cents when it is now paying 30 cents and when there is no complaint from any State prison?

Mr. MCKEOWN. Yes, sir; that if the gentleman will consult some of the men getting the 30 cents per diem food he will find out that it is not at this time sufficient to maintain the men, and why should we write a statute here that provides for food for these prisoners that would not be sufficient for a galley slave? I want a record on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MCKEOWN) there were—ayes 23, nays 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KING. Are we in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union or in the regular House? I was noticing the mace.

The CHAIRMAN. That point of order is well taken; the mace should be taken down. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Page 27, line 23, immediately after the parenthesis, insert the following: "At 68 cents per diem."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that is that yesterday, in changing the 68 cents to $1.08, the idea was that it was for the benefit of the midshipmen at the Academy; but I notice that there was a group at 68 cents, and this is to correct it so that the others will remain at 68 cents and the amendment will apply only to the midshipmen. It is to perfect the amendment that was offered yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 16 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to page 16 of the bill. For what purpose?

Mr. BRITTEN. On yesterday——

The CHAIRMAN. For the purpose of offering an amendment?

Mr. BRITTEN. For the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Concerning what?

Mr. BRITTEN. I will explain.

Mr. BLANTON. We want to know.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRITTEN: Page 16, line 14, after the word "depots," insert: "Provided, Quarterly reports on all gasoline passenger and freight automobiles shall be made on form No. 124, and one copy of each report shall be filed in the Bureau of Yards and Docks."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to page 16 for the purpose of offering the amendment which has just been reported? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the committee provided an amendment, in line 8, page 16, which returned to the Bureau of Ordnance motor-propelled vehicles, and the amendment which I have just sent to the Clerk's desk is intended to perfect the amendment of yesterday.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. So that the Bureau of Yards and Docks may have among its papers the reports of the use of these automobiles?

Mr. BRITTEN. Just as it has over all other automobiles used in the Navy, except those under the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Maintenance, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts: For fuel; the removal and transportation of ashes and garbage from ships of war; books, blanks, and stationery, including stationery for commanding and navigating officers of ships, chaplains on shore and afloat, and for the use of courts-martial on board ships; purchase, repair, and exchange of typewriters for ships; packing boxes and materials; interior fittings for general storehouses, pay offices, and accounting offices in navy yards; expenses of disbursing officers; coffee mills and repair thereto; expenses of naval clothing factory and machinery for the same; laboratory equipment; purchase of articles of equipage at home and abroad under the cognizance of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels therewith, and the manufacture of such articles in the several navy yards; musical instruments and music; mess outfits; soap on board naval vessels; athletic outfits; tolls, ferriages, yeomen's stores, safes, and other incidental expenses; labor in general storehouses, paymasters' offices, and accounting offices in navy yards and naval stations, including naval stations maintained in island possessions under the control of the United States, and expenses in handling stores purchased and manufactured under "General account of advances," and the accounting officers of the Treasury are authorized and directed to credit "General account of advances" with the amount of the net losses which may be certified by the Paymaster General of the Navy as having been incurred in disposing of excess stocks in the naval supply account; and reimbursement to appropriations of the Department of Agriculture of cost of inspection of meats and meat food products for the Navy Department: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for chemists and for clerical, inspection, storemen, store labor, and messenger service in the supply and accounting departments of the navy yards and naval stations and disbursing offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, shall not exceed $3,500,000; in all, $10,500,000.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, on account of my being extremely busy with Indian affairs the last two weeks, holding hearings nearly every day into the afternoon, it has been impossible for me to take part, as I would like to have done, in the debate on the Navy bill, which we are now considering, also the Army reorganization bill, which went through the House a few days ago. I do not desire the Members of this House, however, to think that these measures have not had my careful consideration as they have been progressing through the committees and as they have been under fire here in the House.

I am taking the opportunity at this time to say I have read carefully the bill that is before us, also the report, and that I am heartily in accord with practically every section of the bill. And I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the chairman of the committee and every member of it for their splendid work in bringing about the reduction which has been made in the measure as it was presented to them. While I have heretofore, and am yet, what might be called a big Navy man, I think that splendid judgment has been shown by the committee at this time in cutting out the entire building program except that which is necessary to carry on the original program laid down in 1916.

For my own part, since we are at peace, I can not see why it is necessary for us to have a Navy more than twice as large as we had previous to the war. And therefore I congratulate the committee and the country upon the fact that when this bill finally becomes law it will carry approximately twice the number of men there were in the service when the war broke out, and we will then have a Navy, when once reorganized under this measure, which will be sufficient and able to meet upon the high seas the navy of any country in the world and give a splendid account of itself.

If I may, I would like to say approximately the same thing with regard to the Army reorganization bill. I have always been strong for a medium sized, efficient Army. I believe that we have that now. I am not one of those who has become excited over the lack of morale on the part of the officers of either the Army or the Navy due to the fact that their salaries have not been raised at their request or at the demand of propaganda. I believe that in the main the officers in both the Army and the Navy are men full of enthusiasm and loyalty and in the main they are efficient and able to conduct the responsibilities put upon them in every way satisfactory to the service. There is a good deal of talk about the necessity for an increase in the pay of Army and Navy officers. I believe there is justice in these suggestions. I am firmly of the belief, and have stated it on many occasions, that any man, no matter what his position, who is working for the same rate of wages now that he received previous to the war is working under at least a 40 per cent reduction, and therefore, while I appreciate the condition of the Treasury of the United States at this time, I am firmly of the belief that if a way can possibly be found to do so, the officers as well as the men of the Army and the Navy should receive a substantial increase in pay. And I want to say now that I shall support any reasonable measure of this kind coming before this body.

In closing I desire to say my only disappointment in the Army reorganization bill was that it did not carry a section authorizing the organization of the young men, at least of this country, into a body trained so that they could easily be turned into soldiers if occasion ever required it. I am firmly of the belief that the youth of this country, as well as the economic condition of the country, would be greatly improved by a system of universal military training. [Applause.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to oppose the amendment.

I have listened with much interest to the speech just delivered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER]. He approved everything which had been done and which had not been done likewise. The subject to which I wish, however, to reply is his expressions of regret that this country has not adopted a universal military service plan.

Mr. SNYDER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not use the word "service."

Mr. CARAWAY. There is no difference between universal training and universal service. A man by the name of Shakespeare once said, "A rose would smell as sweet by any other name." If you conscript a boy and bring him into the Army, he is in the military service. I do not care whether you tell him when you conscript him that he is conscripted to train or to have him perform military service. He will discover that it means the same thing.

When we entered the war we led the world to believe that we were doing so for the purpose of destroying military autocracy. I voted for the war under an honest belief that that was to be the result. Now, we have done that. There is not a first-class power on earth to-day, except our own country, that is able to maintain a huge military establishment. Our allies who joined with us in this war are unable to pay even the interest on their bonded indebtedness incurred in waging this war, and the nations which were engaged against us in the war have perished. There is no Austria-Hungary now. They had to send their babies out of that country, even to take them from their mothers' arms, so that they should not perish of starvation. And the collapse of the late revolution in Germany was the last gasp of militarism in that country. There is no military spirit left in Germany and there is hardly a civil government. For what purpose do we undertake, when all the peoples of the earth have laid down the sword, to make this the greatest military power the world ever saw? Against whom are we arming? What is the purpose of this great military program created in the bill which has just passed the House? In this measure is a building program for a great Navy, and the ships will rot at the wharves unless you put into it a compulsory service plan, because men are not going to volunteer, and you know that. It is a useless expenditure of public money in order to keep certain interests in this country placated and furnish them opportunity to make profit. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], the most persistent militarist this House has ever been afflicted with—and I use the word "afflicted" advisedly, because it is a good word and no other one would serve—said just the other day that it would cost $1,600 a year to maintain a private in the service. There are a million young men coming of age in this country every year. Multiply that $1,600, the cost of training each private a year, by 1,000,000 and you will have $1,600,000,000 for universal military training alone.

That does not include the reserves.

It does not include the officers.

It does not include the Regular Army.

It does not include the retirement pay.

It does not include the cost of cantonments.

It does not include the cost of hospitals and the care of the sick and injured.

It does not include pensions.

It does not include the millions that must be expended for cannon and shells.

It does not include the vast sums wasted in foolish experiments.

And it does not include the untold millions that would be lost to productiveness—the abandoned farms and idle shops.

It takes no account of the great expenses of the Navy, with its floating palaces called battleships.

It takes no account of the expenses, nearly $15,000,000 per annum, for the education of officers at West Point and Annapolis.

You are going to burden this country with an expenditure for militarism alone that will practically confiscate the property of this Republic.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will.

Mr. HUSTED. Does not the gentleman think there is any investment value in military training, if properly undertaken, to equip the youth of this country for citizenship and strengthen them physically and morally to meet the questions which arise?

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to answer the gentleman from New York. I have never seen any particular advantage come to the young men of this country from service in the Army in time of peace. We are now staggering under the burdens of the high cost of living, the shortage of production, and does it not occur to the gentleman that will be added to by taking a million young men each year out of production, taking them off the farms and out of the factories and mines, and marching them up and down the public highways for the edification of the spectators?

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman will admit that skilled labor will produce more than unskilled labor?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; I will admit that, and I will admit that the gentleman's question has nothing to do with the subject. [Laughter.]

I hesitate to take issue with the advocates of great preparedness schemes. Many men of fine ability and great patriotism believe this a wise course to pursue. They speak of war as a special science, above all other sciences, and in some respects it is. But notwithstanding our military schools are the best of their kind in the world, that our officers are selected from the very brightest boys in the country, and are given the most thorough training, the most expensive education, they produce fewer men of first-class ability than any other class of highly trained men. Most of the improvement in their equipment are made by civilians. Most of the ideas of organization and care come from men trained in civil life. Most of the great problems of transportation and supply, the greatest problems of modern armies, had in this last war to be devised by civilians or men trained in civil life.

There is a reason.

The Army tends to standardize men. Their work follows a routine. They know the successive steps of their advancement. They cease to have individual initiative. It is a life wherein the individual no longer rises by his own worth, but goes with the State, the group. All these men are highly trained, of naturally great intelligence, but they are lost to the world so far as productiveness goes.

And all these other men—these million men—under this plan would be lost each year to the arts of peace.

The cost of living now is high. There is a scarcity of all these things that support life. And yet under this system we are to make this shortage greater still. This drain will be especially heavy on the farms. Of all the thousands and thousands of farm boys who went into the Army, only 5 out of every 100 came back to the farm. They are now helping to swell the ever-increasing throngs in the cities, while farms are abandoned or tilled by old men, women, and children.

Universal military service presents to our southern people a more serious problem. The negro is a peculiar being. We who have lived with him all our lives do not know him. We recognize his limitations and his weaknesses. We know he has developed no national pride, no national ideals. In all the history of his race he has builded no civilization, no language or philosophy. He has developed no clear ideas of government or religion. His progress, what it is, is imitative. He is vain, easily excited, quick to use violence. If handled carefully and intelligently he makes fairly good farm help. Arm him, train him, and he ceases to display those virtues of obedience and industry. He will no longer be content to farm. He will no longer be obedient to civil authority. We have seen these results from our recent Army experiences with him. We dare not disregard these experiences, we who live in the South. But, on the other hand, if he leaves our southern farms he goes to northern cities and brings with him new problems, social and economic, for you of the North, who least understand him. Race riots recently in East St. Louis, Chicago, and Washington prove this. Your universal military training plans contemplate the industrial destruction of the Negro race, and imperil our peace, and destroy in many sections of the South its agriculture.

But, again, the cost.

With what it cost to train our young men, white men, we could open to them college doors. We could give them college educations as cheaply as we could make soldiers out of them, or we could put them, if they preferred it, through technical schools, either agricultural or mechanical. Which would you prefer your boy had, a highly trained mind, fitting him for future usefulness, or have him know how properly to salute an officer?

Taxes are now oppressively high. Industry is burdened to meet the staggering costs of war. Farmers are share croppers, taxes taking almost as much as they leave. Shall we again divide this small portion remaining to them to inaugurate this great military program?

We are all filled with national pride. We love to think and speak of our country as the mightiest in the world. We are moved by the sight of marching men either in times of peace or war.

From the earliest of my recollections I thrilled with the sound of martial music, the tread of marching feet. I loved soldiers and the stories of war. I have sat many and many an hour at the feet of some ex-Confederate soldier and in imagination charged with him up the heights at Gettysburg or swept with him down the valley with Jackson's "foot cavalry." I have heard with him the bugle sound the charge and the cannon's sullen roar, as he told of his war experience, how he rode with Forrest or marched with Cleburne. But these were childish dreams that took no account of hardships and wounds and death. They looked not to the long years of want and dispair which followed in war's wake.

I pray God my country may escape the fate of Germany and Austria and Russia; Governments which lived by the sword and by the sword perished.

Our purpose for entering the World War was plainly set out in our declaration. We aimed to strike down the rule of might and exalt that of right. The race for world supremacy by force of arms was put to the test of the sword and failed. We fought that liberty might live and those who loved humanity, not those who sought its destruction, might rule the world. We won.

There is not a country on the face of God's earth that can now threaten the peace of the world. Our friends and allies in that great struggle are financially ruined. They must devote all their energies to the arts of peace or go down in the fierce industrial and commercial struggle ahead of them.

Our late enemies have perished. Their people no longer cry out for blood, but beg for bread. In Austria, as I said above, even the children of tender years are torn from their mothers' arms and sent into strange and hostile lands that they may be fed. Austria as a nation, and almost as a people, exists no more. Germany is in the hands of a milder form of bolshevism. Militarism has ruined the world. Friend and foe alike have perished under its iron heel. Are we now to begin where others perished, to try the experiment which destroyed them? Has the fate which has overtaken all peoples, free or slaves, who sought power and conquest by armed might no lesson for us?

I look to the future with hope. I love my country and its institutions. The fate of others may, I trust, warn us and save us. I want justice, fair dealing, liberty, and tolerance enthroned throughout the world, but if this vision be realized my own America must lift high the torch of liberty and light the way. She has never yet failed the world and will not now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fuel and transportation: Coal and other fuel for steamers' and ships' use, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling the same; maintenance and general operation of machinery of naval fuel depots and fuel plants; water for all purposes on board naval vessels; and ice for the cooling of water, including the expense of transportation and storage of both, $10,000,000: Provided, That the United States Shipping Board shall not require payment from the Navy Department for the charter hire of vessels furnished or to be furnished from July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1921, inclusive, for the use of that department when such vessels are owned by the United States Government: Provided further, That $1,000,000 of this appropriation shall be available for use, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, in mining coal or contracting for the same in Alaska, the transportation of the same, and the construction of coal bunkers and the necessary docks for use in supplying ships therewith; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to select from the public coal lands in Alaska such areas as may be necessary for use by him for the purposes stated herein.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order against the two provisos in the bill mainly for the purpose of securing some information from the committee. My interest in the first proviso is suggested by the fact that I am a member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House. I would like to inquire if the provision to the effect that "the United States Shipping Board shall not require payment from the Navy for the charter hire of vessels furnished, or to be furnished," and so forth, is suggested by or acquiesced in by the Shipping Board?

Mr. BUTLER. I understand so.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On what is your understanding based?

Mr. BUTLER. Simply because it avoids an expense otherwise necessarily incurred, and is simply taking money from one pocket and transferring it to another.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman might readily see that that is a matter of bookkeeping in the Shipping Board, but still the Shipping Board is vitally interested in it.

Mr. BUTLER. This provision was in the bill last year, and we have continued it at the request of the Navy Department, with no protest from the Shipping Board. I had a talk with Admiral Benson on other subjects the other day, and he made no protest against this provision. This was not called to his attention by me, but the Shipping Board made no protest against it last year. It may be necessary for us to call upon the Shipping Board to enable the Navy Department to get some coal around through the canal to the Pacific Ocean. The same provision in last year's bill is in operation now, and so far as I know there has been no opposition whatever to it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to say this to the chairman of the committee, that while I recognize the fact that these are both governmental agencies and the expenditures for transportation really in the long run comes from one or the other, and therefore out of the Public Treasury or its assets, the Shipping Board, of course, is entitled, even as a bookkeeping proposition, to an opportunity to present its views on a matter of this sort which may involve millions and tens of millions of dollars. I simply desired to ask the chairman of the committee if the gentleman thought it of sufficient importance to call it to the attention of the Shipping Board.

Mr. PADGETT. It has been operating for a year, and they have made no complaint about it. The Navy has been training thousands of men for the Shipping Board, and there has been an interchange of services between the two institutions.

Mr. BUTLER. I asked one of the bureau chiefs whether or not we should take that provision out or leave it in, and he asked that it be left in another year on account of some possible emergency that might arise that would require us to call upon the Shipping Board to perform that service.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If that meets the acquiescence of the Shipping Board, I shall not press the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. Without objection, the word "further" will be inserted after the word "Provided," on line 14 of page 16. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will correct the spelling of the word "magazines," in line 22, page 31.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, line 20, after colon, following the sum of $2,000,000, insert the following: "Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to accept, on behalf of the United States of America, from the city of Erie, Pa., free from all encumbrances and conditions and without cost to the United States Government, title to the naval brig Niagara; and, upon delivery of said vessel to the United States, to make expenditures from the appropriation 'Construction and repair of vessels,' for the restoration, preservation, and maintenance of said vessel in the city of Erie, Pa., including the construction of suitable facilities for anchoring said vessel and properly preserving it for historical purposes."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves a point of order.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read in my time a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEAR MR. BUTLER: Your letter transmitting on behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, H. R. 6862 [SHREVE], a bill for the repair, preservation, care, and future maintenance of the restored historical naval brig Niagara, Commodore Oliver Hazard Perry's flagship in the Battle of Lake Erie, requesting the views and recommendations of the department thereon, has received my consideration.

The restoration of this historical naval vessel and its use as a resting place for the relics of that memorable battle and their exhibition to the public would, in my opinion, serve to keep before the minds of our people the deeds of heroic figures in the earlier naval history of this country.

Naval tradition is regarded as one of the important elements in the building up of morale and navy spirit. Besides these considerations it is believed that the Navy would reap a direct and tangible advantage by the advertisement which the restoration of this old ship would afford. Furthermore, the bill provides that the vessel may be used for a local Navy recruiting station in the city of Erie, Pa., which to my mind is another desirable feature.

I heartily indorse the passage of this bill.

Yours, very sincerely,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York make the point of order?

Mr. SNELL. I shall have to make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. SHREVE. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. SNELL. I will reserve it.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, this is a very historic ship.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] has the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman yielded the floor and received permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SHREVE. I desire to continue my remarks now, Mr. Chairman. I believe I have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used five minutes. If he wishes five minutes more he can ask unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may have five minutes additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague [Mr. SHREVE] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I want briefly to tell you the story of the old Niagara. She lay on the bottom of Erie Harbor for nearly 100 years, and the Perry Centennial Commission of Pennsylvania, in the spring of 1913, raised the old ship. The older Members of the House here will recall that a former Congress, perhaps the Sixty-second, appropriated $250,000 toward building a monument to Commodore Perry at Put in Bay. That monument was to perpetuate the name of Commodore Perry, and at the same time to commemorate the 100 years of peace with our mother country. Ten States of the Union joined with the National Government in that enterprise. They were the States surrounding the Great Lakes, and also Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Mississippi, and Louisiana, if I remember correctly.

I do not propose to tell you the story of what happened in that year, but I want to tell you that the old Niagara, raised from the bottom of Erie Harbor, sailed out of that harbor on the 1st day of July and visited every important port around the Lakes, where centennial celebrations were held by the various States, and in the city of Chicago alone 100,000 school children visited the old ship. I do not propose to tell you the story of the Niagara, how she was constructed in Erie Harbor, how she went out and met the enemy, how Commodore Perry, in the thick of the battle, when the Lawrence was disabled, left that ship and in a small boat transferred to the Niagara; how she became the flagship, and how in a short time the supremacy of America was established on the Great Lakes and the great Northwest Territory returned to the United States. [Applause.] But I do want to tell you one thing, and that is on the day following the battle, when the fleets lay in Put in Bay Harbor, both sides preparing to bury their dead, and at 4 o'clock in the afternoon Commodore Perry, with his officers and men, and Commodore Barclay, of the British fleet, with his officers and men and their dead, lowered their small boats and moved to the shore. Their landing was picturesque. The place selected for burial was dug beneath the foliage of an old elm tree, and these men, British and American alike, two by two, marched back to this burial place. There those men were buried, a volley was fired, and they returned to their ship. The remains of those men, American and British, side by side, rested there for a hundred years, until they were removed and placed in the vault of the great memorial at Put in Bay, an achievement without parallel in the history of the world, an accomplishment that should give war-stricken Europe of to-day a hope for a better to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHREVE. I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that his time be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHREVE. It was from this old ship, the Niagara, that Commodore Perry sent his famous message, "We have met the enemy and they are ours." The least we can do is to turn this old ship over to the Government and let the Government take it and care for it. Let it be forever a reminder of the valor of our fathers, who fought for a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, and let it be an enduring emblem of hope that this country may never again be embroiled in war. Let it be a reminder of the day when the pride of Britannia was humbled and the queen of the seas was uncrowned. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I concede that the point of order must be sustained if the gentleman from New York insists upon it; but I would ask the gentleman who made the point of order whether he would be willing to withdraw it and allow this amendment to be amended by limiting the amount of money?

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. The conditions in regard to this boat are no different from what they have been for a good many years, are they?

Mr. BUTLER. She is wasting away.

Mr. SNELL. She has been wasting away for 100 years.

Mr. BUTLER. She formerly belonged to the Navy. Now, I would not vote for anything like an extravagant appropriation of money to preserve this old boat. I do not want to see her sink, however, and go out of sight. This is the only provision in the bill that has any sentiment in it. Everything else is blood and roaring guns. This ship is an inspiration to the people of the country. Do not let it go, my friends. I will agree to consent to a limitation upon the amount appropriated, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. SNELL. How are you going to limit it if you have taken it over? Let me ask the gentleman this question: How much is it going to cost to rehabilitate the ship?

Mr. BUTLER. It was suggested that it would cost the sum of $25,000.

Mr. SNELL. If it is going to cost $25,000 I shall object.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman will offer an amendment, or accept one that I shall offer, I will ask to limit the sum to $10,000.

Mr. SNELL. Make it $5,000 and I will agree. That will take care of it for the present year.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield? It would be useless to make a limitation of $5,000, because that would be a burlesque; it would not repair the vessel. If we are going to do it, let us do it right, and if we are going to refuse it, let us do it straight out. Let us deal with it in good faith.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not making this suggestion for the purpose of putting anything over on the membership of this House, for I do not believe in doing that. I do not mean to conceal any purpose I have in mind. But I am so anxious that the old ship should come back into the possession of the Government that I am willing to consent to limit the amount now and allow the House to pass on it at some later time.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for an interruption?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I think there is some misunderstanding about this matter. The ship was on the bottom for 96 years, and in 1913, on the anniversary of the centennial, it was rebuilt. It is in good condition at present.

Mr. SNELL. Then it does not need $25,000 this year; would it not go another year?

Mr. BUTLER. I am willing to limit it to $5,000.

Mr. SNELL. I would agree to limit it to $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York make or withdraw his point of order?

Mr. SNELL. I will withdraw it for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not withdraw it for the present.

Mr. SNELL. I withdraw it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by adding the words "Provided, That the amount of money to be expended shall not exceed $5,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment of Mr. BUTLER to the amendment of Mr. SHREVE: At the end of the amendment insert: "Provided, That the amount of money expended shall not exceed $5,000."

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SEARS. If this amendment is voted down, then the original amendment is in order?

Mr. BUTLER. Do not vote that down.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask for further information. This boat was raised several years ago. Where has it been since that time?

Mr. BUTLER. In the bay at Erie, Pa.

Mr. HARRELD. Who claims to own it?

Mr. BUTLER. It was turned over in an informal way to the city of Erie.

Mr. HARRELD. Does the city claim to own it?

Mr. BUTLER. It is conceded that, by what occurred, the city of Erie has title to it.

Mr. HARRELD. I would like to know how we are going to acquire title to it.

Mr. SHREVE. The amendment provides for taking that; it says the title shall be surrendered.

Mr. HARRELD. Let me ask the gentleman, Is the city of Erie trying to unload a white elephant onto us?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir. The boat belonged to the American Navy. It was abandoned and sunk in Lake Erie along about 1825, and it remained on the bottom of the lake until this celebration occurred, when it was raised and renewed by funds contributed by the city of Erie and the State of Pennsylvania.

Now the title is construed by the Government to be in the city of Erie, and the Government now desires to have it back.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. SHREVE. Let me understand this amendment. This is for this year only?

Mr. FESS. It is for only one year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This paragraph carries an immense sum, $30,000,000, for the repair of ships; that is, I anticipate that the most of it will be used for that purpose, although there are other uses to which it may be applied. This is carried in a lump sum, and I suppose it would be impossible for the committee to appropriate it in any other way for the repair of ships. I am not objecting to that. What I am objecting to is the number of old ships that are carried in our Navy, useless ships, under present conditions, upon which I have no doubt some of this money will be expended.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I suppose the gentleman is discussing the proviso for the repair of these two old ships?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, no; I do not object at all to the use which is proposed to be made of these two old ships, the Kearsarge and the Kentucky. They are of no use or value as they stand now; they never were a success, on account of faulty design, and if they can be made into crane ships, I have no doubt that the money will be well expended. I think it could be so well used for that purpose.

In the evolution of naval warfare we keep progressing every year, leaving behind the old vessels; but unfortunately our Navy does not always leave or consign to the scrap pile all that ought to be placed in that heap. At the time of the Civil War we started with the Monitor. The original Monitor carried only 11-inch smoothbore guns and armor of 11-inch laminated plate. Its projectiles failed to pierce the armor of the Merrimac when fired point-blank. The monitors of later construction carried 15-inch smoothbore guns and somewhat heavier armor. About the same time England built her first armored vessel, the Warrior, and France hers, La Gloire. From these vessels the modern battleship was evolved. The turret system for sheltering the guns, first used on the Monitor, was preserved, but what was known as the monitor type was soon discarded.

The early turreted battleships carried, as a rule, about four large guns, with a secondary battery of smaller guns. Such were the Iowa and Oregon, which we thought wonderful ships in their day; but now broken up. Next in this country the dreadnought was planned. The dreadnought, as I suppose the members of the committee understand, was a ship that had all big guns in its main battery. We built the first two that were ever constructed of that type, the Michigan and the South Carolina. More dreadnoughts were built to match them by England, and more by our own country. Now we have the superdreadnought, which so far surpasses the dreadnought that it is utterly impossible for the dreadnought either to fight it or run away from it. It can not fight it, because neither its armor nor its guns are sufficient to put it in competition with the superdreadnought, and it can not escape because its speed is lacking. A superdreadnought could stand off out of range of the dreadnought and destroy it without being harmed. It is the same with reference to the cruisers. We started out with the unarmored cruiser, and then we built the armored cruiser, and now we have the battle cruiser, by reason of which all of the armored cruisers are obsolete, the armored cruisers being neither able to fight the battle cruiser nor to run away from it, because their speed is so much slower. In the battle off the Falkland Islands the English battle cruisers choose their distance and sunk the German armored cruisers without receiving any serious damage.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Are we going to have men enough in the Navy to man all of the vessels we could otherwise put in commission?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUSTED. I think it is perfectly clear that we are not going to have enough men to man the vessels we could otherwise put in commission, and that being true, it seems to me it is the height of folly to maintain the old type of vessels that we have not got men to man and which are going to cost us a great deal of money without adding much, if anything, to the efficiency of the Navy.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman has said what I was about to say—probably much better than I could have expressed it. I notice in the program of the fleet that is expected to be kept in commission there are 13 predreadnought battleships. England plans to scrap all of her predreadnought vessels, and quite properly.

Mr. LITTLE. Will all those ships be obsolete at the time they are completed?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am speaking now of old ships. They were built some 18 years ago, some of them.

Mr. LITTLE. Of those that are on the program, how many will be obsolete when completed?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can not say. I will discuss that later when we come to the construction program. I want to speak of these old vessels. It was stated yesterday by the chairman of the committee that 13 of these predreadnought vessels are to be kept in commission. Of what use are they? Why should they be kept in commission?

As I stated before, they can not fight a dreadnought and they can not run away from it. They can not even match an armored cruiser. They could fight an armored cruiser if the armored cruiser would stand up to them, but it is not expected the armored cruiser would do anything of that kind. They are so slow that they are a drag on any fleet.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. By the appropriations which we have made in this bill they will not be able to keep all of these ships in commission. Take, for instance, the coal item alone, which is right before us. I suppose these ships will be kept only in about half commission.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I tried to ascertain, in speaking yesterday, just what ships the Navy Department was going to scrap, but I could not find out. I do not know whether the gentleman is in possession of the information or not. England has scrapped 156 of her fighting ships, and very wisely so, because they are of no further use. That is what we ought to do with these old predreadnoughts, and as soon as we get our battle cruisers we ought to scrap all of our armored cruisers, because they will be of no further use.

Our light cruisers are so old and slow that they are obsolete. We have three large armored cruisers, superior in their day to those of any country in the world, because they carried heavier armor and heavier guns than any armored cruisers afloat. They were 14,000-ton ships, mounting four 10-inch guns. We did have four, but one was lost. These ships have a speed of only about 22 knots, which is far surpassed by the slowest of the battle cruisers. We have no scout cruisers, and we need these comparatively small, extremely fast ships, constructed not for fighting but for scouting purposes.

I suppose as long as we have no battle cruisers, and none have been completed yet, we will have to keep our armored cruisers. The program calls for the retention of about all the cruisers we have got now. As I said before, I do not know how we would get along without some cruisers, but they would be useless in the line of battle.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not want to inject myself into the gentleman's remarks unless it is entirely agreeable to the gentleman——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will yield to my friend.

Mr. BUTLER. They tell us that they added to the list of ships which were to be sold 63 vessels, embracing all classes, going back as far as the Indiana, the Massachusetts, and the Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, yes; the Massachusetts and the Iowa are over 20 years old and ought to have been sold and scrapped a long time ago. I supposed they had been. What I contend is that a large number more should be scrapped.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. It has been running through my head whether just because a ship gets out of date it ought to be scrapped. Is that the best use that can be made of it? Does the gentleman mean that it would be absolutely useless in case we got into a war?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Practically of no use, but I suppose they might possibly be used as coast defense. That advantage would be very small in that way compared with the expense. I mean that they can not be used satisfactorily. It would not pay for keeping them up, for equipping and manning them with men.

Mr. FESS. Is it inevitable that as fast as we do build these new types of ships that other new types of ships will put them out of date?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, yes. When we come to the matter of construction of new vessels I hope to discuss that question also. That is one of the things that in the progress, in the march of events, we must expect, that all the ships that are now being and proposed to be constructed in a few years will become obsolete.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for another question a little different?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FESS. It was stated yesterday that if England did not propose to increase her program and we continued for three years, that we would equal Great Britain's power on the sea.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Correct, except that possibly it would be four years instead of three.

Mr. FESS. Does that take into contemplation the large merchant marine of England that could quickly be converted into auxiliary naval vessels?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think not. I might say to my friend that as naval science has progressed, the science of naval construction, the use of auxiliary cruisers from the merchant marine has decreased. They were used during the late war under great pressure, but they will be used less and less as proper vessels for that purpose are constructed.

Mr. FESS. The question coming to me is when we get on a level with Great Britain on the sea on battleships would we be on a level in our ability to continue?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think so. The fastest merchant vessel is very slow compared to the recent battle cruisers or the scout cruiser. The merchant vessels may be used as troop ships and colliers; in the last war they were also used as cruisers when armed. I do not think they will be again. They would be an easy prey of the battle cruisers, and on account of their structure could not be armed heavily enough to fight the scout cruiser.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the Navy Department will be subject to just censure if it does not ruthlessly throw out the old and useless ships from our Navy. If it does not, only one inference can be drawn, and that is that they are retained to furnish an excuse for keeping more officers and men.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I do so merely, Mr. Chairman, to clear up, if I can, what may be a little apprehension on the part of one or two gentlemen who have spoken. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] asked the question whether or not a battleship merely because it was old became obsolete. Of course, age probably accounts for 75 per cent of the obsolescence of a battleship, but I want to draw attention to the fact that we have to-day some cruisers in the American Navy that are old cruisers, but they are efficient because they have speed. It is largely speed that counts, whether or not a battleship is efficient to-day or not. That, of course, is plus your guns and the armor, but I want to bring out that it is not merely age alone that makes a battleship obsolete.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What is the highest speed of any of our cruisers—about 22 knots?

Mr. HICKS. No; some are higher.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman consult his book as to that?

Mr. HICKS. I want to state further in regard to some queries asked by the gentleman from Iowa, and that is this: I am a believer myself in crossing off the list many of these old ships unless they have the speed, because there is no use of continuing those ships in service, with all the expense of maintenance. While a few of these ships may be of use as a part of our fighting fleet, they are comparatively of little value. One of the great lessons of the great Jutland fight, if you will read the account of that battle published by the Germans themselves—now published secretly, but in all probability soon to be open to the public—read that from the German standpoint and then read the account from the English standpoint, and one lesson taught is that the old ship of small speed is not an advantage to a fighting fleet, but a detriment in maneuvers, and had better be left in the home port.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. In a moment. Now, one of the things that this item is to be used for, I will say to my friend from Iowa, is not merely to repair the old ships, so far as keeping up their engines and their boilers and all that is concerned in ordinary repairs, but a large amount of the money is to be used for permanent improvement in some of the big battleships—rebuilding them—in changing the bridges, in installing fire control, thereby interpreting into iron and steel some of the lessons of this Great War, in order to make those ships more efficient. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. PADGETT. I just wanted to remind the gentleman that, when we speak of the 13 predreadnoughts or battleships prior to this war, the dreadnoughts that we have are very valuable ships, and they constitute the second line of defense; and in the statements made they overlook the fact that other countries in their navies have ships of like character, but not so good as ours of that type, and ours are valuable as against that type of ship of other countries.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does not the gentleman know that England is scrapping all of these predreadnoughts?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman ought to know it.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman should not be misled by cursory statements made in the newspapers. The gentleman should not believe that they are throwing away good ships.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York two questions: The first is, Who gained the battle of Jutland?

Mr. HICKS. I appreciate this is a controversial matter, and for years will be in dispute. Personally, I believe the British gained it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How did it happen that it took two months to find it out?

Mr. HICKS. The result of the battle was that the German fleet never came out again, and their morale was undermined.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How did it take so long for them to find out that they had gained the victory?

Mr. HICKS. The British are slow to reach conclusions. There were a whole lot of things that were not known until the official reports were made and examined into.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The second question is, Why did we not sell those old ships as junk?

Mr. HICKS. I think we ought to sell them, and use every effort to do so. At the present time there may be a chance to sell them to some of these newly organized nations in Europe, who want to have the appearance of being a full-fledged power.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Are these newly organized Republics that we created fixing to get up a war?

Mr. HICKS. I think they want the battleships as a sort of indication that they are really nations, and they want to borrow the money from us with which to buy our ships, I presume.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They will not do it with my vote.

Mr. HICKS. Nor with mine.

Mr. SNELL. In looking over this last proviso of $3,500,000 for repairs, and so forth, is not that practically the same item that was brought in the House here a while ago in the act providing for $10,000,000?

Mr. BUTLER. No; it is not. We considered those figures in the committee.

Mr. SNELL. From all the information that I can get—and I looked at the hearings, though not fully—part of it is the same item.

Mr. BUTLER. No. It is for drafting, inspection, watchmen, and messenger service, and so forth, not to exceed $3,500,000.

Mr. SNELL. None of that item is carried in that. As to the one turned down in the House, is any of that provided for in the $30,000,000? Is not the same item in it that was turned down in the House two or three weeks ago, when that matter was fully discussed?

Mr. BUTLER. I am going to answer. This sum is a smaller sum than was taken off. The gentleman is referring to the proviso on the bottom of the page.

Mr. SNELL. I am referring to both items. They both refer to the same thing.

Mr. BUTLER. They wanted more money than $30,000,000. The amount of money that was originally agreed to in the committee that we would report to the House for the repair of these vessels was a smaller amount than they asked for. Finally $1,000,000 more was added, because it seemed, after giving a great deal of attention to it, that that sum should be increased. Now, that is necessary to repair and maintain our ships of the first and second lines and our destroyers. There may be in this amount some money that will be used for that purpose, I will say to my friend, but we did not write into the bill the amount of money, or anything like it—or, as I understand, any portion of it—which the House rejected here some time ago.

Mr. SNELL. Have they reduced the force working in the navy yards since the House refused to grant that expenditure a short time ago?

Mr. BUTLER. I understand—and I am only giving my friend my best understanding; I would not know unless I asked the question directly—but I understand they have reduced it some 12,000 or 15,000 men.

Mr. SNELL. That reduction has taken place since?

Mr. BUTLER. Since Congress declined to make that appropriation.

Mr. SNELL. I looked through the hearings in a cursory manner, and it seemed to me a good many items were carried in there that the House refused to provide for some time ago. I may be mistaken.

Mr. BROWNING. That was a deficiency appropriation they wanted for this year. Our appropriation does not commence until next July.

Mr. SNELL. Does it provide for the same items in making improvements that the House thought could be extended over a year or two, when labor and material would not be so expensive?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. If the chairman will permit, in making up this item of $30,000,000 on page 32, and $28,000,000 on page 34, these amounts are determined by the number of ships and the type of ships that the Navy Department said would be the active fleet of the Navy for the coming year. Covering a long period of years, it has been determined by experience that it costs about so much to keep up a ship of a certain type when in active service. Now, figuring the number of ships they intend to keep in commission, of various sorts, it was necessary to appropriate for each of these bureaus the amount carried in this bill.

Mr. SNELL. You do not think, then, that we are appropriating to carry any extra number of men on the pay roll during this time, when labor and material are so high?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No; it is to care for the ships in the active fleet for the coming year.

Mr. KNUTSON. I want to ask the chairman a question. Did the late war demonstrate what type of battleship was best adapted to modern warfare?

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman means the best sort of ships to use in fighting?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I can not answer the question. I do not think so, however. Some of us, however, were impressed with the fact that they want the swift ships and great guns. They are going to reduce the armor, perhaps, but they want 16-inch guns and ships that will travel 25 miles an hour. I think that was the lesson learned in the Great War. You will notice it was said that there was not enough speed in some of the English ships to get between the German ships and the fort—between the German ships and their station. Consequently, as I understand it, the nations of the world propose, as they build more ships, to have them of greater speed and with less armor and heavier guns.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would I be warranted in inferring from the gentleman's remarks that the tendency is to shift from the dreadnought to the battle cruiser?

Mr. BUTLER. No. The battle cruiser is a very effective weapon, their right hand, all the time; but, all in all, as long as men fight on the sea, you will find that the battleship is the spine of the Navy. It is the thing that takes the knocks and the one that is able to give them.

Mr. PADGETT. In the Battle of Jutland the lesson learned was that the cruiser fighting against the battleship would be sunk. All the British ships that were sunk were sunk by gunfire from German battleships.

Mr. KNUTSON. Was that due to the fact that the British battleships did not get up to the scene in time?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; the cruisers attempted to fight battleships, and they were never intended for that, and they are not intended for that now.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to strike out several words in order to ask the chairman a question. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] has again mentioned the Battle of Jutland, which involved the question of armor, I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] if he has read a book written, I think, by a man by the name of Barrett, in which he quotes from Admiral Jellicoe's writings, in which Admiral Jellicoe states that while the Battle of Jutland was going on, when, I believe, Admiral Beattie was in command of the British fighting ships, Jellicoe was behind and did not go into the fight because he was trying to figure out whether or not he could get close enough to the German fleet to do any damage to the German ships, without the German ships, which he assumed to be more powerful than his, penetrating the armor of the British ships, and therefore he held back, and the battle was not a real decision.

Mr. BUTLER. No; not conclusive.

Mr. McKENZIE. And he says if Jellicoe had gone in and taken his chances the war would have ended two years sooner than it did.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. I know that the war has been going on in what is called "the Admiralty" to find out the reason why that battle was not won decisively, and as I gather it the reason was that the officer in command of the cruisers did not have enough of them, and his guns were not large enough to warrant him in going in with safety between the Germans and their port, and therefore the German got by and went back to his lair, as you might call it.

Mr. McKENZIE. After a time the Germans sailed back to their ports and the English to their ports.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. If the commanding officer in that battle had had these six great ships that are provided for in this bill there would have been a conclusion, and the German would not have gone back to his harbor. With the 16-inch guns and the enormous cruisers of 35-knots speed, they would have headed off the enemy. That is the discussion that is going on. They have their troubles over there, as we have our troubles over here.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out enough words to permit me to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nevada is recognized.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, it is a source of satisfactory information to follow this committee of distinguished gentlemen, where it appears that all the leading European countries have abandoned to a great extent building the various warcraft, we should join hands with foreign nations in their curtailment of warships program. Where material has been provided, contracts let, and construction under way, there is good reason to complete ships now being built, but there is no good reason for planning and beginning new warships of any description.

We are pleased to note that Europe has checked their usual enormous expenditures upon battleships, requiring five years to build, and to a great extent obsolete upon completion. Let us follow their humane antecedent. There is no fit reason why nations representing modern civilization should persistently pursue the barbarous custom of kingly war.

Great battleships have not prevented, but perpetuated, vile massacres of the first Christian Armenians. What assurance is there that ships of war will guarantee their lives to the civilization which does not mean shooting shells into weaker races of men. Civilization does not mean great parades of glistening bayonets, field kitchens, and terrifying T. N. T. To me it means abolishing barbarism by patient education. It means that nations will observe the Golden Rule, with protection for the weak in all their rights to life and happiness.

Better that America be first in the proud example of peace and justify our claims of good will upon earth. We can well afford to prove our honest and peaceful intentions to all the world by a policy of trust for European peaceful precedent, regretting that our own country was not first in the move toward this humane effort; but we may quickly concur by following their forward step away from barbarism, which will be to them not only common courtesy and to ourselves common sense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nevada has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

One swordmaster, $1,900—assistants: 1 $1,700; 1 $1,500; headmaster in physical training, $2,200; instructors in physical training—1 $2,100, 2 at $2,000 each, 7 at $1,900 each; assistant librarian, $2,500; cataloguer, $1,800; shelf assistants, 2 at $1,400 each; secretary of the Naval Academy, $2,750; clerks—2 at $2,100 each; 2 at $1,900 each; 2 at $1,800 each; 9 at $1,600 each; 4 at $1,400 each; 23 at $1,300 each; 7 at $1,200 each; repair man or seamstress, $1,000; surveyor, $1,700; services of choirmaster and organist at chapel, $1,700; captain of the watch, $1,600; second captain of the watch, $1,500; 30 watchmen at $1,400 each; 5 telephone switchboard operators, at $840 each; mail messenger, $1,200; in all, pay of professors and others, Naval Academy, $436,350.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will correct the spelling of the word "attendance," on page 38, line 11.

There was no objection.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. KRAUS: Page 39, line 4, after the word "list," strike out "$3,705,952" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,382,202."

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this appropriation is based upon the strength of the Marine Corps fixed at 27,400 men. That is not the permanent strength of the Marine Corps. The authorized permanent strength of that corps at this time is 10,000 less, and the reduction involved in this amendment is the reduced amount required because of the proportionate reduction in the commissioned officer personnel of the corps. I submit that there is no justification for an increase in this corps, either in enlisted personnel or commissioned personnel, such as is sought to be maintained in this bill. In saying this I am fully mindful of the wonderful work done by the Marine Corps in our recent war; but the real reason underlying this application to Congress for these additional funds is that it will be possible in the first instance to make use of a great many additional land facilities that were acquired during the war, for the war, and only for war purposes.

As an illustration, I am calling your attention to the large marine land station at Quantico, which no man on this committee would say we would have acquired had it not been regarded as necessary for war uses during the recent war. Its continued use in peace times can be in no way justified.

As a matter of fact the Marine Corps is to-day attempting to invent uses for this particular station, a station so located that vessels of the usual draft which go to foreign ports carrying our marines and their supplies can not come up to this particular base. I am calling attention to this locality because it is illustrative of the entire situation as to what we are required to expend for the maintenance of unnecessary facilities. In this particular instance during the first six months of this fiscal year we have expended over $372,000 for maintenance, repairs, and preservation, and undoubtedly if we continue this course in the next bill you will be asked to replace buildings there which were constructed for temporary purposes, and which were adequate for the purposes for which they were sought to be used. You will be asked to replace them by permanent construction, and you will impose upon the Treasury a permanent expense for maintenance and repair, together with the accompanying overhead at the department.

There is undoubtedly one other major cause underlying the effort to increase the permanent enlisted personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps, and that is under existing law it carries with it automatically a proportionate increase in the commissioned personnel, and the retention in present rank substantially all the officers who obtained temporary advancement during the war. The purpose of my amendment is to have the House make an appropriation in accordance with existing permanent authorized strength of the corps. If at any time in the future we are to have legislation on this subject, it should be reported in a bill for that purpose, so that the House may consider the whole matter seriously and on its merits.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I have always been interested very deeply in this branch of the service—this famous fighting corps. If there is any part of the service in which I have taken a particular interest it is the Marine Corps. Its performances during the last war have justified the hope that I had in it.

The gentleman asks to strike out a certain amount of money which the committee have recommended that the House appropriate. I have here before me the places to which these men have been assigned, officers and men, during the last year.

Mr. Chairman, we propose to ask this committee to allow us to add a few more men to this great corps. This is needed now because a large part of it was destroyed; and the men now in the corps are waiting to know whether they are to continue in the service of the country. These men faced the enemy at the Marne, and yet if Congress declines to increase the number they will be compelled to go back into civil life. That they may know whether they can remain with the corps, the question ought to be determined now so that it may be known to them.

Now, this is a larger sum than was appropriated three years ago, or the year immediately prior to the war, because they did not have as many men in the Marine Corps as they have now. Congress has permitted the corps to remain at 27,400 men. That provision of law was written into the bill in the last Congress. Now, we have asked that this corps, in which the country takes so much pride, may retain this number of men so that we may have at least one branch of the military service of this Government that is full in numbers. The men can be enlisted in this corps because there is a sentiment which induces men to come from the shops and the schools and join it. The history of the corps is an inducement for men to come in.

Then there is a plan we have before us, to which my friend from Alabama, Mr. OLIVER, has directed much attention, and I am going to ask him to say a word on the matter. We propose to put these men up in the air. These daring fellows were men who marched through the Black Forest and defied the Huns, and they will take the air with the same courage. We propose to have a flying corps that these men may use the flying boats if there is any occasion to fly, and so perform the service for the Navy that they have performed heretofore so well on land and sea.

They now have 17,500 men, and they are entitled to so many officers. This will enable them to remain in the service, and I ask you to bear in mind that many of these young men came into the service in the hour of danger, and they desire to remain in it. Why not let us bring this corps up permanently to the number that it had last year, and let us have a full corps? One-quarter of this corps now is down in Haiti and Santo Domingo. It is distributed around to all stations in the United States. At Quantico there are a few. Quantico came to us in time of war. Those of us who have looked at it say that it is a good place to train men. We can not keep the marines in the navy yards, because the room is needed. We have to have some place where they can be taught to fly; we have to have some place where they can be taught to shoot; and I think the best place is Quantico, established by the Government during the war.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. In the event that the provision in the bill increasing the strength of the corps to 27,500 should be subject to a point of order, you would not need this appropriation.

Mr. BUTLER. There is a question whether it is subject to a point of order. If Congress determines that the enlisted men in the Marine Corps shall remain at about the present enlisted strength of 17,400, we will not need all of the money for the officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana will not prevail. The present authorized strength of the Marine Corps is 17,500, and this provides for 20,000. The present strength of the corps is something like 14,000 or 15,000; but they are exerting efforts to bring it up. There is need for the full 27,500. In the bill they assume that by the end of the year they could get it to that. In the first part of the year they would not, and so we put it on an average of 20,000.

The service is an honorable service; it is one in which we all have a justifiable pride. Their conduct during the war justified it, and the committee has been, I think, if anything, too parsimonious. I doubt if the 20,000 that we have appropriated for will be a sufficient number, but I hope that the committee will not cut it down.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly.

Mr. HUSTED. Is not the Marine Corps more actively used in a time of peace than any other branch of the military service?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Is not there more need now for an increase in that service than there was before the war?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. If you land soldiers in a foreign country it is an act of war. But you can land marines and it is diplomatic. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it necessary to have two major generals with this Marine Corps?

Mr. PADGETT. There is only one of them that is permanent. The other is a temporary officer, and that officer has been ordered before a retiring board and will pass out in a few days.

Mr. MADDEN. It does not seem to me that it is justifiable to have two major generals.

Mr. PADGETT. There is only one permanent, and the other is limited to the duration of the war.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not what this bill provides. This bill provides for the pay of two major generals.

Mr. PADGETT. That is providing pay for him only while he is on the retired list, and under the law he goes out as soon as peace is declared, or not exceeding six months thereafter.

Mr. MADDEN. When is peace going to be declared?

Mr. PADGETT. And, more than that, I notice in the newspapers the other day that he has already been ordered before a retiring board on account of his health.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of officers prescribed by law, on the retired list: For 2 major generals, 4 brigadier generals, 8 colonels, 5 lieutenant colonels, 23 majors, 39 captains, 16 first lieutenants, 7 second lieutenants, 2 marine gunners, 1 quartermaster clerk, 2 pay clerks, and for officers who may be placed thereon during the year, including such increased pay as is now or may hereafter be provided for retired officers regularly assigned to active duty, $278,740.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is it customary to put pay clerks on the retired list? Are they a part of the Military Establishment?

Mr. BUTLER. According to my recollection, they were included years ago in the Military Establishment. The pay clerk goes to sea; he goes along with the ship. I can not recall the year when this was done, but it seems to me about a dozen years ago the pay clerk was included in the Military Establishment by provision of law.

Mr. MADDEN. This refers only to the Marine Corps and the Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And these pay clerks are in the Navy?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. I doubted very much the wisdom of it, but it was said that they are like the chaplain and have to be on board ship.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of enlisted men, active and reserve list: Pay and allowances of noncommissioned officers, musicians, and privates, as prescribed by law, and for the expenses of clerks of the United States Marine Corps traveling under orders, and including additional compensation for enlisted men of the Marine Corps qualified as expert riflemen, sharpshooters, marksmen, or regularly detailed as gun captains, gun pointers, mess sergeants, cooks, messmen, signalmen, or holding good-conduct medals, pins, or bars, including interest on deposits by enlisted men, post-exchange debts of deserters, under such rules as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, and the authorized travel allowance of discharged enlisted men, and for prizes for excellence in gunnery exercise and target practice, and for pay of enlisted men designated as Navy mail clerks and assistant Navy mail clerks, both afloat and ashore, $10,308,331.20.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KRAUS: Page 40, line 4, after the word "ashore," strike out the figures "$10,308,331.20" and insert "$9,081,573.20."

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Chairman, I will take just a moment of the time of the committee to call attention to the fact that this is an effort to bring the appropriation down to a point where it will take care of the authorized strength of the Navy as it will be after July 1, if there is no change made in substantive law. The appropriations in this item, I understand, are made upon the basis of 20,000 men, while the authorized strength under the law as it will be after July 1, if there is no modification in the meantime, will be 17,400. The figures employed will bring the amount down to that sum.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, this is the same question, and I hope the committee will not reduce the amount. Of course, if we can not appropriate for 20,000 men, we can return and make the reduction accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The authorized enlisted strength of the active list of the Marine Corps is hereby established at 27,400, distribution in the various grades to be made in the same proportion as provided under existing law.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state what his point of order is?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is legislation on an appropriation bill. It is an attempt to increase the size of the Marine Corps.

Mr. BUTLER. Has the gentleman from Indiana the act before him authorizing that this be done?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. In what year was it passed?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have before me the act of Congress, the appropriation bill in the Sixty-fifth Congress, where we undertook to and did increase the strength of the Marine Corps temporarily to 27,400 men. The committee is now asking to make it permanent. There was no authorization and I presume the point of order was not raised against the clause. It is clearly subject to a point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question or two?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. The value of having this made permanent is because there are a number of very valuable officers in the Marine Corps who fought through the war in France, on the Marne, in Belleau Wood, men who marched up in front of the enemy, and all of that, who demonstrated their ability and their fitness and eminent qualifications. If you keep the Marine Corps on a temporary basis, their status as officers will be temporary. They would not know whether they would remain longer than a year, and they are unwilling to stay with that status. They want to know whether they are to remain officers or are to go out ultimately.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Are these men going to remain in the service whether the salary of the officers is increased or not?

Mr PADGETT. As far as I know I have heard nothing on account of that.

Mr. SNELL. Then this is one branch whose officers are not resigning on account of not getting an increase in salary?

Mr. PADGETT. I have not heard of anything of that kind.

Mr. SNELL. And, on the other hand, we have to legislate to make more places to take care of the officers here.

Mr. PADGETT. We have the places now. They are filled by these men at the present time. They are holding them under temporary commissions, and when peace is declared, or not later than six months after the declaration of peace, they will go out. If they are kept on a temporary basis, they are up in the air; they do not know what their future is to be. They are needed. We need the 27,400 men. This is not a useless thing. We have demands for marines in Central America and various places.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Do we need these men at the present time?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. And the service would be crippled if the service was cut down?

Mr. PADGETT. It would. We need them for present duty. To dispense with them would be to injure the service. If these men can not be given a permanent status, they want to go out into civil life, where they are to know what they are to be and where they will have a permanent status.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman tell us how many there are in the service at the present time?

Mr. PADGETT. The service is on the basis of 27,400 men, the number we have in this bill; that is the present number.

Mr. SNELL. That is the present number actually in the service to-day, or practically that.

Mr. PADGETT. The officer or commissioned personnel is prescribed by existing law to be 4 per cent upon the enlisted personnel. Now, the permanent commissioned personnel is upon 17,400. Now, there is a temporary commissioned personnel upon the difference between 17,400 and 27,400, or 10,000, but there is this modification. The law authorizing this temporary increase does not give the full percentage of increase in the higher officers. It gives the full increase up to major and then cuts down the percentage on the higher officers on the temporary increase above major. I hope that the gentleman from Indiana, in the interest of the service and for the urgent demand of it, will not insist upon the point of order.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not a fact that the marines are the most valuable military arm we have, and that we can send them into all parts of the world, and that the 27,000 men are needed?

Mr. PADGETT. I have stated it was actually needed and——

Mr. KNUTSON. And you can send them where you can not send the Army, because the Constitution prohibits the sending of the Army——

Mr. PADGETT. Diplomatically.
Mr. KNUTSON. And it is different.
Mr. OLIVER. If the gentleman will permit——
Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Tennessee is not speaking to the point of order; he is arguing the merits of the question.
Mr. PADGETT. I am addressing myself to the gentleman who made the point of order to see if he would withdraw it.
Mr. MADDEN. I thought there was not anything pending except the point of order, and the gentleman is not speaking to it.
Mr. PADGETT. No; I am not speaking to it. I am speaking to the gentleman, asking him if he will not withdraw the point of order, and submitting to him the condition and the necessities of the service and the reason why it should be withdrawn. I want to say further that there is a very large demand for marines in Central America, in South America——
Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. PADGETT. In a moment—in Mexico, in China, in Japan, and all over the world wherever we have intercourse and communication it is necessary for us to have some marines, and we do have them. There is a necessity for that number, and that service will be greatly embarrassed and crippled if we do not maintain it.
Mr. JUUL. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee to what extent would the 27,400 be reduced if the gentleman's point of order prevails?
Mr. PADGETT. It would be reduced to 17,400; it takes off 10,000.
Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. PADGETT. In just a moment. There must be a little margin for a turnover. For instance, when we send a man down to the Tropics he can not be kept there permanently, as conditions will not permit it; health, living in the Tropics, makes it necessary for them to have a turnover and a change, and the committee has gone into it very thoroughly and fully and has been very conservative.
Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman state to the committee that the commissioned personnel of this branch of the service now comes from the enlisted men?
Mr. PADGETT. Yes; that is just what I was going to say, and I am glad the gentleman called it to mind. The commissioned personnel in the Marine Corps is by promotion up from the enlisted personnel. It is the only service where we have the whole commissioned personnel coming up from the enlisted personnel by promotion.
Mr. KNUTSON. And is it not the most democratic form of our military service?
Mr. PADGETT. I say so; and I say it is the best.
Mr. KNUTSON. And the most efficient, too.
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist upon his point of order?
Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do.
Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, that question came up——
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.
Mr. PADGETT. All right.
The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was made upon this same item, or practically the same item, in the consideration of this bill a year ago, and the point of order was sustained by the Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. There is a provision in the statute of 1908 under the head of "Marine Corps" in the naval appropriation act which provided:

That hereafter the number of enlisted men in the United States Marine Corps shall be such as the Congress may from time to time authorize.

That expression in the statute of 1908 is a very common expression in many acts providing for bureaus, departments, and so forth. The present occupant of the chair construes, and construes the decisions of the Chair in the past, that it does authorize the Congress to appropriate for such force here also and specify the number if it so desires. The present provision in the bill, however, goes beyond that, and the present occupant of the chair thinks it would be construed by the executive officers as constituting permanent legislation, although it does not contain that common word "hereafter," which we frequently use for that purpose. In the current law it is provided:

That the active list of the Marine Corps is temporarily increased to 27,400.

"Temporarily increased" is left out of the provision in the pending bill, which says:

The active list of the Marine Corps is hereby established at 27,400.

Which very likely would be construed as permanent legislation. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.
Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, may I send an amendment to the Clerk's desk?
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.
The Clerk read as follows:

Page 40, line 5, strike out the paragraph, lines 5 to 8 inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:
"The number of enlisted men in the Marine Corps appropriated for by this act is authorized at 27,400."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order on that amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to be heard on the point of order?
Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The amendment does not change the proviso in the bill as drawn in any particular. The bill as it reads provides that the authorized enlisted strength of the active list of the Marine Corps is established at 27,400. The amendment provides that the number of enlisted men in the Marine Corps appropriated for by this act is authorized at 27,400. It does not even come within the purview of the language that was had for the appropriation made in the Sixty-fifth Congress, where it established the strength of the Marine Corps temporarily at 27,400. I insist that under the law which provides that the strength of the Marine Corps shall be as fixed by law from time to time it does not mean that the strength of the Marine Corps can be fixed by law in an appropriation bill. It must be fixed by law as the law provides it must be fixed, by an independent act, coming from the proper committee, for the purpose of fixing the strength of the Marine Corps. And I further insist that the provision in the act of the Sixty-sixth Congress would have been subject to a point of order, for that was a change of existing law and it was put in an appropriation bill. This is likewise legislation in an appropriation bill, which is, in the first instance, attempting to make permanent the strength of the Marine Corps, and the amendment proposed does not change that in any particular, for it likewise is attempting to make permanent the strength of the Marine Corps, and providing that the appropriation in this bill shall be for a Marine Corps—of what number? Of 27,400. In other words, the strength of the Marine Corps proposed by this amendment shall be 27,400. It is legislation in an appropriation bill, a thing that can not be done as against a point of order.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.
The Chair quoted before the language of the appropriation act of 1908:

Provided, That hereafter the number of enlisted men in the United States Marine Corps shall be such as the Congress may from time to time authorize.

Of course, it is quite true the rules of the House can not be changed by an act of Congress in which the House has acquiesced. But this provision in the law was put there under construction of the rules by the House and with knowledge of the construction of the rules by the House. It does not seem to the present occupant of the chair that that provision was in the act of 1908 in order to authorize Congress to legislate upon the subject thereafter, because it does not require the permission of an act of Congress to permit Congress thereafter to legislate in the matter of a legislative act, and it is quite clear to the present occupant of the chair that the purpose of putting that provision in the law was to authorize the fixing of the Marine Corps strength in the appropriation and making the appropriation for its support; and that, without apparently Congress making or fixing the enlisted force in the appropriation act or in some other way, there would be no enlisted force provided for at all, because there is no provision now for an enlisted force and strength beyond the present fiscal year. And this law requires that the enlisted force and strength shall be fixed by Congress or shall be as fixed by Congress. The Chair thinks therefore it would have been perfectly clear for the committee to have included an item making an appropriation for such and such a force of enlisted men in the Marine Corps, in the same manner as Congress and the House under the rules of the House constantly increases the number of clerks for various services, letter carriers, and so forth, in the Post Office Department, and as the legislative bill, coming into the House, constantly carries an increase in the number of clerks in the various departments at fixed salaries; and it is quite within the power of the House under the rules of the House to insert an appropriation for so many enlisted men in the Marine Corps. The Chair thinks that is substantially what this amendment does, and the Chair therefore overrules the point of order.
The question is on agreeing to the amendment.
Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the chairman of the committee that his amendment provides for striking out all these lines.
Mr. BUTLER. They go out anyhow.
Mr. JUUL. They were stricken out under the point of order?
Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. PADGETT. At the end of the amendment add the words:

As the permanent enlisted strength of the Marine Corps.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that was prepared to be offered at the end of the paragraph as it stood before the point of order was sustained, and I would like to ask unanimous consent to let it follow the language of the amendment of the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment following the language of the amendment just agreed to. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKEOWN: Page 40, following the amendment just adopted, insert: "Provided, That no marine shall be kept in the Torrid Zone for longer than one year at any one assignment."

Mr. BUTLER. I make a point of order against that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order for a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. I will reserve it.

Mr. McKEOWN. I just wanted to call the attention of the committee, and I hope it will meet the approbation of the department, to the fact that these marines should not be kept in these Torrid Zone regions longer than 12 months or 18 months at the outside, without having a reassignment and bringing them back so that they can recuperate their health. I am sure if the gentleman has talked with any of the marines he will find that such a provision will hold up the morale of these men who are assigned to these islands. Take the case of Haiti——

Mr. BUTLER. If this force stays in the bill and the provision becomes a law, and is authorized for next year, I have not a bit of doubt that the suggestion the gentleman is now making will be followed. They try to renew them every 12 or 18 months. They have been obliged, on account of the war, to keep them longer than that down at Haiti and Santo Domingo and these other places. I know that it is the desire of the Secretary of the Navy and the commandant of the Marine Corps to relieve these men very frequently, so that their health may be secured to them.

Mr. McKEOWN. I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

Increase of the Navy, construction and machinery: On account of hulls and outfits of vessels and machinery of vessels heretofore authorized, to be available until expended, $48,000,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think that on all the previous bills that have been brought in before this committee I have approved all of the increases that were proposed by the Navy, but I very much regret that this bill provides for so large a sum as is found on this page, totaling $104,000,000 for the "increase of the Navy," and this amount measures only in reality a very small portion of what will be expended when the program is carried out.

Mr. QUIN. How much is it that this carries? I would like to know in dollars and cents.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. How much it would cost to complete this program?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Five hundred million dollars.

Mr. BUTLER. Including this, my friend is right. It is a little short of $500,000,000. It is $480,000,000 plus.

Mr. OLIVER. It will cost $104,000,000 for 1921, and there will remain due $294,000,000, which should be increased by $70,000,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is correct. I did not have the figures in mind for the moment. In my previous remarks to-day I have already shown how, as the evolution of naval architecture proceeded, at first one kind of a ship and then another became obsolete until we must expect that anything that we could construct at this time would in a few years become obsolete.

Now, we have reached a point where we propose to construct vessels of enormous size, battleships of 43,000 tons—unheard of, unthought of, I might almost say undreamed of, a few years ago; vessels that will cost before they are completed some $40,000,000 each, and vessels which can not be kept in commission, if present prices continue, at less than $2,000,000 per year.

Mr. QUIN. And would not a little old submarine or an airship destroy one of them?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was just about to come to that subject. There are many naval critics of very high authority who have considered that the day of battleships is over. Among them is Lord Fisher, of the English Navy, and Sir Percy Scott, from whom I propose to quote. Sir Percy Scott is one of the most prominent naval authorities in his country. He is the inventor of the fire control now used by our Navy and all other first-class navies in existence. Sir Percy Scott says that the battleship is dead. I do not entirely agree with him, but as I am an amateur I suppose my opinion is not worth very much anyway. I would, however, like to read very briefly from his book, Fifty Years of the English Navy, his reasons for concluding that the day of the battleship is over.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am afraid it will take up too much of my time.

Mr. JUUL. I will make it very brief.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I wanted to know from the gentleman how the increase of $104,000,000 is conforming to the program of economy that the steering committee mapped out for the other committees when we started at this session?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will leave that for the steering committee to answer.

In his book, Sir Percy Scott says:

The battleship of to-day costs roughly £8,000,000; she carries about 1,000 shells containing about 100,000 pounds of high explosives; her effective range is, say, 15 miles; she is vulnerable to aircraft with bombs and aerial torpedoes, and to submarines, the latter possibly carrying a 15-inch or 18-inch gun; and the ordinary automobile torpedo is still in process of development, and may, in the future, carry a ton of high explosives, which would probably sink any battleship.

Of course, he is speaking now of the possible development of the submarine, because there is no such submarine in existence at the present time, and the automobile torpedo is still in process of development. By that I suppose he means the airplane torpedo, which in the last war was effectively used on at least one occasion. He says further:

For £8,000,000 we could build many aeroplane-carrying ships, equipped with aeroplanes carrying over 100,000 pounds of high explosives. If these aeroplanes carried fuel sufficient for five hours, their range would be about 150 miles out and 150 miles home.

In the battleship we put all our eggs into one basket. In peace time the aeroplane-carrying ships could be used as passenger ships, and the aeroplanes for carrying passengers instead of bombs.

The aeroplane-carrying ships and the aeroplanes would cost nothing; they would be earning money. The officers and men to form the crews of the ships would belong to the merchant navy. Aeroplane pilots will be as numerous as taxi drivers and get about the same pay. The battleship waddles along at 20 miles an hour, and can not waddle very far, and in comparison with an aeroplane has a very low rate of speed.

The object in war is to introduce high explosive materials into your enemy's ships or country; transmitting this high explosive by guns is expensive as the container of the high explosive has to be very strong, and consequently very heavy, to withstand the shock of discharge. It takes a battleship weighing 30,000 tons to carry 100,000 pounds of this explosive. Ten aeroplanes weighing about 3 tons each would carry the same amount, so the relative weights of the carriers is as 30 tons to 30,000 tons.

That is one among other specifications showing why he considers that the battleship is obsolete at the present time.

As I said, I do not agree with Admiral Scott in his final conclusion. The battleship is still king of the sea and in the last war could and did go anywhere on the high seas when protected from submarines by destroyers. I do say this: That we ought not to go on constructing 10 or 15 of these enormous ships when they are really experiments. I look for the time to come when airplanes will successfully drop tons of explosives on their decks and aerial torpedoes guided by wireless attack them in all directions.

Now, among our battle cruisers are some of 35,000 tons. I believe our present plans are to bring them up to 39,000 tons. They are to have the enormous speed of 35 knots, greater than any other vessels in the world, surpassing even the new English battle cruiser Hood, whose speed is only 31 knots. But the plans of these battle cruisers have been very severely criticized by those high in authority on this subject. I am not competent to say whether those criticisms are well founded; I do not know. But I do know that these enormous ships are more or less in the nature of an experiment. I do believe they are vulnerable to the airplane and to the submarine, and I think that both the submarine and the airplane are but in the infancy of their development; and if they are perfected, as many scientists think they can and will be, these enormous battleships will represent simply millions upon millions of money wasted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not object to some of these ships being built. We have not a solitary battle cruiser in our Navy at this time. There can be no question but that we ought to have some. I would be willing to have two or three built, but as I understand it the program calls for five or six.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield, to state how much one of these battle cruisers will cost?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They keep increasing in price. The latest figure, I think, is about $38,000,000. These battle cruisers are more expensive than superdreadnoughts, and I think before they are finished they will cost $40,000,000 apiece.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. They cost $36,000,000 three or four years ago.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; and I will say to the gentleman that it is expected to provide them with engines of such enormous size that they will have 180,000 horsepower, or almost as much as is developed by the great Keokuk Dam on the Mississippi. You can imagine how expensive those engines will be and how costly it will be to maintain and operate such a ship. The construction of these ships and their boilers involves placing part of the boilers and engines above the water line. They have been very severely criticized on that account.

Mr. PADGETT. In the new plans that has been remedied, and the machinery is all put below the water line.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The new plans ought to provide for that. But, I repeat, we are putting too many eggs in one basket for something that is entirely an experiment, so far as these great leviathans are concerned, and I wish we were not building so many of them.

Mr. HUSTED. Does not the gentleman think our naval policy could most safely be based upon the opinion of the General Board of the Navy?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The General Board and the other naval experts, but unfortunately the experts do not agree.

Mr. HUSTED. So far as the construction of ships is concerned?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am perfectly willing to leave it to them so far as the plans for construction are concerned, and I think they are proceeding well. Now, these new battle cruisers will undoubtedly be superior to anything that has ever before been built. The earlier British battle cruisers are now about ready for the scrap pile. It is very fortunate that we did not build battle cruisers like the Queen Elizabeth and the Warspite and others which England had constructed. We have benefited by waiting, and we might benefit more by waiting further as to a part of this program.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A good many years ago Representative Peters, of Kansas, was a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and I heard him say once, after he had retired from Congress voluntarily, that there was one thing he was particularly proud of, and that was that when he was a member of the Appropriations Committee he had killed off one battleship. He said it was a great big useless thing, that never would be of any value, and that would become obsolete in a very short time, and would be obsolete by now, and he said: "Of all the things I did in Congress, that is the one I am proudest of—that I saved that money for the people." The Naval Affairs Committee have a program here which is very modest. I want to felicitate that committee upon having cut the enormous requests of the administration as much as they have. I am sorry they did not go further. If the $104,000,000 carried in this appropriation was all that was involved here, I would not have any criticism to offer, but you must remember that it means that we are committed to completing these ships, that we have got to go ahead and spend more than three times as much. Now, I suppose everybody here realizes, of course, that that is just that much waste. You build a battle cruiser for $36,000,000 and some fellow starts out with a $500,000 submarine, and everyone will admit that the battleship will light out for home, and that is the end of the battle. If you want to spend the money, why do you not spend it for 72 submarines, that could drive 72 battleships off the sea? Why do not you appropriate the same amount of money to build flying machines that you appropriate for one battleship? They would make the seas impossible for the big iron tubs. Build aeroplanes and submarines, then scatter mines along the coast in war, and your coasts are impregnable, and then big ships would never venture out in the open, but would lie hid in harbor, like all the big fleets in the late war.

Mr. PELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. PELL. The gentleman spoke of the submarine chasing the battleship away and taking control of the sea. In the recent war the Germans had the submarines and the English had the fleet. Who controlled the sea?

Mr. LITTLE. The English fleet was tied up in harbor most of the time behind the wire nets.

Mr. PELL. Who controlled the sea? That is the question.

Mr. LITTLE. The Secretary of the Interior appeared before our Irrigation Committee once and told us that the submarines were sinking more ships every week than were being built every week and that they were in control of the sea. I brought up that question one day, and I was told that the submarines never sank any ship that could run 17 knots an hour. I asked the Secretary why they did not convoy these slower ships.

He said that the experts agreed that that would be putting up two more targets for the submarines to shoot at. There was one graduate of Annapolis killed in this war. He was killed at Chateau-Thierry, fighting with the marines. That is how much fighting the Navy did in this war. The ship that could run the fastest was able to get through to France, and that was all there was of it. The battleship fleets of England and Germany met one night by mistake, and fought for a few hours, and then both of them lit out for home as fast as they could run. Control of the sea! The submarines never had to go ashore. The submarines never saw a moment when they could not stay out as long as they had anything to eat and drink.

Mr. PELL. Did a ship from any neutral country get into Germany? That shows who controlled the seas.

Mr. LITTLE. The question of getting into Germany?

Mr. PELL. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. I do not think so. I think getting into France was an answer to that question.

Mr. PELL. It was keeping them out of Germany that controlled the sea.

Mr. LITTLE. The coasts around Germany were protected by an immense number of mines. Nobody could get near the coast of Germany, because the mines controlled the sea. The greatest battleship fleet that ever floated stayed within 100 miles of Germany all through the war, and not one of them ever ventured within sight of the German coast. They mined and submarined the coast of Germany, and the ships of England did not dare go outside of the Scotch harbors. The battleship is as obsolete as the tubs with which the victory at Salamis was won over the Persians. You might just as well bring out a wooden ship as a battleship. Any submarine or any aeroplane can chase it off the sea. Every battleship went ashore every time it saw a submarine.

By the time these battleships are finished the improvements in submarines, aeroplanes, destroyers, and mines will leave no room on the ocean for the battleships, except for social purposes and ceremonies.

The committees take the departments altogether too seriously. If their estimates had just been cut in two and reduced one-half we would still be beating the world. Other countries have no money to spend this way. What we need is money for our peace problems. We need to be shown ways to save, not spend.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman's amendment strike out the appropriation for the battleship, or just that part of the appropriation for the six that are uncompleted?

Mr. LITTLE. I was speaking on a pro forma motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. KITCHIN. I thought the gentleman had an amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. No; my theory was that if I presented the matter clearly enough, some influential leading Member like the gentleman from North Carolina might then go ahead and offer an amendment and put it through. The administration should desist from its constant demand for big war-time appropriations. Right now we are better prepared for war than we are for peace.

Total increase of the Navy heretofore authorized, $104,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 47, line 13, after the figures $104,000,000 insert: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid out for the construction of any battleship, cruiser, or submarine heretofore authorized, the contract for the construction of which has not been let."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to that.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to be heard on it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to the statement made by experts to the Naval Committee to the effect that the ships of the Navy already in existence will become obsolete before the naval program in this bill and those of 1916 have been completed. It is admitted on every hand that every ship in the Navy now existing will be scrapped in 1924. Of course, they will be scrapped if you continue to appropriate money to build new ships. The purpose of those who manage the Navy is to have new floating palaces and to set aside a ship adequate to meet the needs of the present day if they can get the money to build new ones.

If these ships authorized in 1916 have not yet been contracted for, we can well afford to wait until some future time when we may find it necessary to enter on a different program from that on which we have already entered.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. SNELL. How many new ships are we starting to build?

Mr. MADDEN. I think 13 new ships authorized in this program. Thirteen battleships and cruisers, costing from thirty to forty million dollars each.

Mr. SNELL. How many are already started?

Mr. MADDEN. I understand they have started six of the ships so far, and some people profess to say that the contracts have been let for all of them. I do not believe that that is true.

Mr. SNELL. Am I correct in understanding that no other nation is building ships of that character at the present time?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not in possession of information that will permit me to answer the gentleman with any degree of intelligence.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to answer the gentleman?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No other except Japan.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman from New York for his information, if he is not already in possession of the information, that the naval program submitted to the House of Commons by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in England a day or two ago is not much over one-half of the appropriation that is being made in this bill.

Mr. SNELL. That was the statement by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MADDEN. If you take out the $115,000,000 included in the bill for the payment of obligations created during the war, and then take enough out to represent the exchange, and it is only $5,000 more than half of what this bill carries.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Is not the statement as to what England is doing or intends to do based simply on an unconfirmed Associated Press report; that we have no authoritative information about it?

Mr. MADDEN. The only information we have is the statement carried in the Associated Press, said to have been made by the man in charge of appropriations in the English Navy.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I took pains to have that corroborated from the British Embassy.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would like to have the gentleman's judgment upon the statement made as to the rate of exchange; is not the increase in the rate of exchange substantially offset by the decrease in the cost of labor, materials, and supplies in Great Britain?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not able to answer the question of the gentleman from Virginia about the labor cost or the cost of materials in England as compared with the cost here.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The English budget to which the gentleman refers is confined only to construction of vessels and not to the question of pay, or anything of that sort, is it not?

Mr. MADDEN. This is confined to construction.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the gentleman referred to the amount carried by the bill. The amount that he mentions in England is for the construction of vessels.

Mr. MADDEN. I said the amount was a little over one-half of what this bill carries if we take into consideration the $115,000,000 carried in the bill for the payment of obligations created during the war.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The English budget referred to by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] included pay and everything connected with the Navy.

Mr. MONDELL. The statement that I made yesterday with regard to the English budget includes all expenditures, as I understand, including construction.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Expenditures, including construction, including the Marine Corps, including the pay of the men?

Mr. MONDELL. As I said at that time, I do not know whether it includes the Marine Corps.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in any event, whether it does or not, it seems to me that we can well afford to carry on the program we inaugurated in 1916 to the extent it has already been well begun, and that we can afford to wait on that program that has not yet been started until we see what naval architecture is to say of future needs.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Is the gentleman informed as to whether the contracts for any of these ships have not been let?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. OLIVER. The Navy Department informs the committee that contracts for all of the ships have been let, so what effect would the gentleman's amendment have if it should pass?

Mr. MADDEN. It would not have any, if that is true.

Mr. OLIVER. Is it the purpose of the gentleman that it have no effect?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I would be glad to have it amended so that it would have effect.

Mr. OLIVER. The only effect the gentleman's amendment would have would be this: There are three battleships now being constructed in Government navy yards—two at New York and one at Mare Island. These are well on the way toward completion. All of the material has been assembled, the keels have been laid, work has been commenced. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to stop the building of these three great battleships?

Mr. MADDEN. No; and the gentleman knows that I have no such purpose.

Mr. OLIVER. That would the the effect of his amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. He also knows that the work on ships being constructed in the navy yards will be construed and mean contracts let.

Mr. PADGETT. Every battleship and every battle cruiser has been let.

Mr. MADDEN. And the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] does not have to ask that question. He is 21 years old, a man of ordinary good common sense, and he knows very well that the question he asked was asked only for the purpose of attempting to embarrass me, and he can not embarrass me by any such question.

Mr. KITCHIN. May I inquire who is the man who has ordinary good sense in this House?

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman did not refer to the gentleman from North Carolina. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. In order to clear up any question about whether or not the Navy Department does let a contract with the navy yards, and I have some little doubt about that——

Mr. MADDEN. Whether they let them or not, if they are carrying on the work.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I would suggest that at the end of the gentleman's amendment he add the words "or construction begun."

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I will do that.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Then I see no objection to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That will let them all be built.

Mr. MADDEN. No; I think that will stop some of them. I think that broadens the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman's amendment is finally submitted will he yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It is simply this, that if the amendment is to be adopted, in order to have any practical effect, it strikes me there ought to be a date limitation, which will forbid doing what the gentleman contemplates ought not to be done, after March 24, 1920.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I would suggest that the words be added to the amendment "or construction begun as of this date." Let that be put at the end of the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I suggest to the gentleman that he ought to name the date.

Mr. MADDEN. March 24, 1920.

Mr. HICKS. What does the gentleman mean by "construction"? Is it construction of steel or things of that kind?

Mr. MADDEN. Everything that enters into the fabrication of material that goes into the ship is construction.

Mr. HICKS. How about the blue prints, is that part of the construction?

Mr. MADDEN. Not at all. You can not by any stretch of imagination work it out that a piece of paper is any part of the construction of a battleship.

Mr. HICKS. It is a very important part of the ship.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment so that it will read as the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 47, line 13, after the figures "$104,000,000," insert: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid out for the construction of any battleship, cruiser, or submarine heretofore authorized, the contract for the construction of which has not been let or construction begun March 24, 1920."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that his amendment be so modified?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] reserved the point of order to the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I did, but it seems to me that it is a limitation. I am not a very good parliamentarian. I think that would be construed to be a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. BUTLER. I will while I think it over for a moment.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I must admit that I know little or nothing about this bill, and, in my opinion, the gentleman from Illinois knows less than I do about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I just wish to say to the gentleman from North Carolina that with that very lack of knowledge on the matter there is some hope we will get some sense into this bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is exactly the point I am trying to make. I understand his amendment will prevent any appropriation of money from being expended for ships not already contracted for and being built.

Mr. MADDEN. Or under contract.

Mr. KITCHIN. None of those, and, as I understand, the principal object of the gentleman's amendment is to save the appropriation for the two battleships, the Iowa and the Massachusetts, Nos. 53 and 54, which have not yet been begun?

Mr. MADDEN. If it does that, I will be very happy.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the only real saving the gentleman is going to have by his amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. That will be $60,000,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman's amendment does not cover that.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, it does.

Mr. KITCHIN. The question has been raised as to when the construction of a battleship begins. There is one gentleman who says it is begun when the blue prints are made. Another says it is begun when they assemble the materials, and they have assembled some, a little material. Let us put it right and say that no money shall be expended out of this appropriation for any ship whose keel has not on the 24th day of March been laid.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I do not know how much that would interfere with the program.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am trying to get it down to something definite.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to go to the extent of crippling the whole program. If it is going to affect those two ships, as I believe it will, this amendment will do that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me suggest this to the gentleman: That no money under this appropriation shall be expended for the further construction of battleships Nos. 63 and 64, naming the Iowa and the Massachusetts. Now, if the gentleman wants to save on those two ships, if he wants to do that, as he said he wants to do, or if he wants to do what Mr. GREEN of Iowa says he wants to do, and a great many other Members themselves want to do, that will do it and it will not cripple anything.

Mr. MADDEN. I think I had the floor.

Mr. KITCHIN. It will just cripple those two ships.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman from North Carolina beyond any question shows he knows nothing whatever about the naval program by making a statement as to the names of the ships that are not yet begun or in connection with which blue prints have not been made. My amendment goes further than his proposal. It provides that no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the construction of any battleship or any cruiser or any submarine the contract for which has not been let and the construction of which has not been begun on the 24th of March, 1920. So that I am not confining this amendment to the question of battleships or to the question of cruisers or to the question of submarines; I am taking in the whole gamut of the naval program. I believe that the adoption of this amendment will result in a saving of $150,000,000, and I am sincere in that. With regard to the question of when the construction of a ship is begun everybody knows that there is no greater joker in the House than the gentleman from North Carolina, and when he asks a question, whether the construction of a battleship——

Mr. KITCHIN. I will not take all of that to myself; I think the gentleman from Illinois is equally——

Mr. MADDEN. Whether the construction of a battleship is begun by the making of blue prints, the gentleman knows very well he is not in earnest. Everybody knows you can not start a battleship by the making of a blue print. You make the design of a ship on a blue print.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, after having consulted with the highest authority in the United States I have concluded——

Mr. KITCHIN. MADDEN or myself?

Mr. BUTLER. That there is nothing in the point of order, and I therefore desire to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws the point of order. The gentleman from North Caroline offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]: At the end of the amendment insert: "And provided further, That the appropriation for naval construction of every kind shall not in any fiscal year exceed the appropriation for the same purpose authorized by the British Parliament."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order against the amendment. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KITCHIN. What became of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois that meant nothing?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair knows of no such amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I thought the gentleman from Illinois offered an amendment a little while ago.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment, but that was not the inquiry of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, the change in the attitude of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is somewhat amusing. I called his attention to the fact that if statements by naval officers of high repute could be relied on there are no ships provided for in the 1916 program for which contracts had not been let, except three now being built in navy yards and on which much work has been done. I then asked the gentleman if he was really in earnest and sincere in asking that construction stop on the 1916 capital-ship program or any part of it. He replied, "Of course, I am." Now, surely the gentleman could not insist that the ships being built in Government navy yards are under contract.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. In just a moment. Now, when the gentleman was confronted with this fact, in order to make sure that his amendment could accomplish nothing, he amended it further by adding "or on which any construction has been begun."

So the gentleman's amendment now reads:

Provided, That the appropriation carried in this bill shall be expended on any ship for which no contract has been let or on which construction has not yet begun.

The testimony shows that contracts have been let on all ships except three, and——

Mr. MADDEN. That would include the navy yards the gentleman raises the question about.

Mr. OLIVER. That is true, as your amendment now reads, and for that reason it is absolutely meaningless.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not going to admit that.

Mr. OLIVER. Yet that can not be successfully contradicted. In order to make sure that your amendment meant nothing, you accepted the other amendment, "or on which construction has been begun." Seriously, it can mean nothing whatever.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not believe that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to interrupt the gentleman from Alabama a minute.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does not the gentleman from Alabama know that the gentleman from Illinois, by his amendment, intended to mean nothing? [Laughter.]

Mr. OLIVER. I am not in disagreement with the gentleman from North Carolina on that point.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Illinois means nothing. He has always got the most serious way of any man in the House. I knew it was a joke when he offered it from the way he looked, because he assumed a more serious appearance than he has at any other time to-day.

Mr. OLIVER. As the gentleman assumed that he knew nothing, I thought it well to inform him that he knew nothing.

Mr. KITCHIN. He said the amendment meant nothing, because it can mean nothing under this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I am not willing to admit that the making of a blue print is the beginning of a battleship.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois one question.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has not the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But I want him to take the floor.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman to ask a question of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Have all these contracts been let?

Mr. MADDEN. They say they have made the blue prints for some of these ships. If that is letting a contract, they are let; but I do not admit that the making of a blue print, making the map of a ship, is letting a contract for a ship or doing any part of the construction work on a ship.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If these contracts have been let, what sense is there in your amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. There would not be much. There might be plenty of sense in it, but there would not be any effect. It certainly would not do any harm to take a chance on it and see whether they are let or not.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. It is a very simple matter to find out whether these contracts have been let or not; and if they have been, why, of course, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois would not be effective.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Just a minute. Let me make this statement, and then I will yield to the gentleman.

I have here a list of all the ships authorized under the 1916 program, with the names of the contractors, the degree of completion of the ships, and other data relative to this program. And contracts for all of the dreadnoughts, 12 in number, including 2 that were not in the 1916 program, have been let. The work on them has already been started in private or Government yards, so that the gentleman's amendment would not affect any of the dreadnoughts proposed in the 1916 program. The contracts for the six battle cruisers have already been let or work has already been begun in Government yards, so that as to all of the 16 capital ships all the contracts have been let or material has been ordered and work is under way.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield to a question?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Are all of these ships named?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I have the names.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I ask if any one of these ships will rejoice in the name of Scotland Neck? [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I do not see the name of Scotland Neck in the list.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I thought possibly the friendship which exists between the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina and the Secretary of the Navy rather necessitated the fact that one of these ships would be called the Scotland Neck.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I would say this to the gentleman from Ohio, that in the absence of the name of Scotland Neck I do find the name of North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the same thing. Scotland Neck is North Carolina. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] evidently does not know it.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan to yield.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to know why the Committee on Naval Affairs seems to be so solicitous about the adoption of this amendment if all the contracts have been let for the ships? Why not let it pass and see whether they are let or not? It will call the attention of the department to the condition of things, and if the contracts have not been let they will stop them.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I am simply supplying the information to the gentleman upon which the Naval Committee acted in framing the bill. We did not go ahead and ask for appropriations without knowing the situation in reference to the ships, and I am stating to the committee now that the contracts for these ships have been let, or that on those that are to be built in the Government yards the work has already begun. And so as to the ships named, the large ships, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] would have no effect. The only effect that it would have would be to suspend construction on 12 submarines, 9 destroyer tenders, and 1 transport.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman will understand that the Navy Department has already suspended them and has informed us that they did not intend to build them, and we made no appropriation for them.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes. We made no appropriation for them.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have followed the gentleman closely, and I know he has stated the facts. So if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] passed it would not save the taxpayers a copper cent, would it?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I do not see how it would.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not, either. That is what I have been trying to convince the gentleman from Illinois about.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Is there not provision in this bill to increase the cost of these ships, making the appropriations larger?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. If that is so, why is it necessary, if the contracts have already been let?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. As to those ships that are under construction in Government yards it is necessary to increase the cost.

Mr. SNELL. What ones are those?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. And a large number of those built in private yards are being built on what is known as the cost-plus contract system, and that makes it necessary to increase the limit of cost.

Now, I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that the House has no intention of abandoning the policy of naval construction which we entered upon in 1916. We should finish up those ships that are started or where the contracts have been let and where millions of dollars have already been invested in material or equipment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment. It is not in writing, but I can dictate it. It is: "But no part of this appropriation shall be used in payment for any work done on any ship heretofore authorized and now being constructed under the cost-plus contract plan."

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois commit his amendment to writing?

Mr. MADDEN. I will do that. I would like to know what the gentleman's point of order is.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the passage of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] would cost the Government millions of dollars. I do not know how much, but it would run into millions. These great battle cruisers are something new in construction, and the Navy Department has never been able to get anybody to undertake the construction of them on any basis other than cost plus. The contracts have been awarded, materials have been fabricated and supplied, great naval ways have been erected upon which these ships are to be built, and if the gentleman's motion should prevail all work of construction would stop and absolute chaos would result.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Does the gentleman recall that in November, 1916, before we entered the war, this very matter was brought to the attention of the House, and the House authorized contracts for these vessels to be let on the cost-plus basis?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. After a long and extended hearing which the Committee on Naval Affairs held on the subject?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I would like to know, as a matter of information, if these contracts that have been let were let for immediate construction?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes. Most of the contracts were let a long time ago, but during the war work was suspended on them because the facilities were needed to be used in other directions.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. These gentlemen have not been stating the point of order that has been raised. I want them to state what the point of order is.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 47, line 13, after the figures "$104,000,000," insert: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used in payment for any work done on any ships heretofore authorized where such ships are being constructed on the cost-plus contract plan."

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is clearly a limitation.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I would not venture to advance any argument in view of the well-known parliamentary knowledge of the Chairman.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say, in connection with the amendment that I have pending, that the cost-plus contract plan has been a disgrace to the Nation from the beginning to the end of the war. The scandal that has existed all over the United States in connection with the cost-plus contract plan is a stench in the nostrils of the American people, and the people everywhere throughout the land have reached the conclusion that the time has come when the Congress of the United States should declare in favor of protecting them against the avarice both of Government officials and private individuals with whom they have contracts. Millions upon millions of dollars—yes, billions—have been made and paid out of the taxes drawn from the people of the United States since the beginning of the war until now, and still we are proposing in days of profound peace to go on forever filching the Treasury of the United States under this cost-plus contract plan.

Why, everybody knows that from the beginning to the end of the war men without number were placed upon the pay roll wherever these contracts were being carried forward; wages outrageous were being paid; that three men were employed where one man was needed; that extravagant waste in the purchase of materials was admitted everywhere; and that the inspectors of the Government and officials from the highest to the lowest paid no attention to the cost.

The time has come when the people are going to insist upon protection from highway robbery of this sort. We are here to-day face to face with a condition that we can not ignore. The question arises now, Are we for or against the people? Are we in favor of these men who have become multimillionaires out of the Treasury of the United States? Are we to forever continue to load the backs of the American people with taxes that they are not able to bear? Are we to legislate forever for the men who have Government contracts without limitation as to cost?

The time has come, the hour has struck, and we must declare once for all whether we are for the people or for the grafters. I am for a relief to the people by a reduction in their taxes, and you can not reduce their taxes so long as you permit contracts to be let without any limitation on the cost. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, during the hearings I started out on the same old road that my friend is on. I had hoped that there might have been some way discovered by which we could have suspended it without its costing the Government an enormous sum of money in carrying out this program. So I turned to the hearings. As will be seen by reading them, on February 20 I was informed by Admiral Taylor, chief constructor of the Navy, that they had positively begun the construction of the 10 battleships and the 6 great cruisers. I further learned from him that much of the material had been ordered. We had spent over $100,000,000 of the people's money already toward the completion of this program. I learned further that contracts had been made which could not be canceled. We asked the Bureau of Ordnance to reduce the great sum in this bill, and they satisfied us that the contracts had been made and could not be avoided without putting the Government to an enormous expense.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. If the Government were to terminate a cost-plus contract, what damage would the contractor suffer? What would be his measure of damages, and how could the Government lose any considerable amount of money?

Mr. BUTLER. Congress authorized the building of these vessels on the cost-plus plan. They went to the New York shipyard and had it lengthen its ways on which to build these great ships. Furthermore, they authorized the New York yard to employ men, to buy steel, to go to an expense amounting to many hundreds of thousands of dollars to construct these great cruisers. I want to repeat what I said, that I started out on the same line with my old friend from Illinois, but I found it was impossible for us to stop the completion of one of these ships without putting the Government to an enormous liability and very great indebtedness.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. In a moment.

Mr. TINCHER. What I do not understand is this: If they do this work on a cost-plus basis, a form of contract that this Government does not want to tolerate one minute longer than it is necessary——

Mr. BUTLER. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. TINCHER. If the work to-day was unperformed, what would be the measure of damage?

Mr. PADGETT. I want to say——

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen can not interrupt the speaker who has the floor without the permission of the Chair.

Mr. TINCHER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania yielded to me.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. TINCHER. If the work has been begun under a cost-plus agreement and if the Government terminates the contract, I wonder if the committee went into the proposition to ascertain what measure of damages the contractor would have against the Government?

Mr. BUTLER. No, my friend, we did not.

Mr. TINCHER. Then, in my opinion, the gentleman is not justified in saying to the House that it would cost the Government millions of dollars to terminate these contracts, because I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that you can terminate every one of these contracts now and make legitimate business contracts and save the Government millions of dollars by doing away with these cost-plus contracts.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say to the gentleman that for two years and a half the Government has been begging contractors to build these ships. They positively will not construct them. We have never been able to get a contract on the old basis. Therefore the Congress authorized the department to have these ships built on a cost-plus contract. I did not like it, but Congress has authorized it to be done.

Mr. PADGETT. What I wished to say was that they can not get flat contracts. They can only get cost-plus contracts.

Mr. TINCHER. Then, I say let us not build the ships. Let us not build them at all if we have got to build ships that are going to be obsolete before they are finished and build them under a cost-plus contract.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman did not include that in his question. He did not say anything about the ships becoming obsolete.

Mr. TINCHER. No; I did not.

Mr. BUTLER. These ships will not be obsolete. No ship is obsolete under 22 years.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman, as a matter of information, whether as a matter of fact it is safe and practical to build these great warships on the ordinary contract plan?

Mr. BUTLER. I wish I could answer my friend. I do not believe it would be possible to get them built in that way. I think they are largely experimental, because of their enormous size and power.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the amendment will not be agreed to, for the simple reason that it will be very ruinous and destructive. The contracts have been made, the work has been begun, the material has been purchased. They have spent about $112,000,000; $160,000,000 have been appropriated; $112,000,000 have been expended; and the remaining $48,000,000 will be expended during this current year, making the whole $160,000,000. To put such a limitation upon it as is here proposed would simply subject the Government to an enormous expense.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. JUUL. I learn that under this cost-plus plan as high as 8 per cent is allowed. Now, it has been said in this House that one-half of 1 per cent is about the highest per cent that anybody should be allowed to have. [Laughter.]

Mr. PADGETT. I listened to the very exuberant and dramatic speech of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] when he left his seat and proceeded to promenade down into the area in front of the chairman, and by the great gusto of his address I was reminded of the young theologue who left the theological school and went out to preach to a country church. He took for his text, "They that turn the world upside down have come hither also."

He said, "I want to call your attention to three subjects. First, you will note that the world is wrong side up; second, that it needs turning right side up; and, third, I am the chap to do it." [Laughter.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I will not take up much of my time, as seems customary, in eulogizing the distinguished members of this committee, the chairman, and my friend from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY], and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING]. Our regard for them is all taken for granted. We all want a good big Navy, a good smart Navy, one that will meet all the necessities that may arise, and until business conditions of the world are settled down to normal. But what are these vessels going to do to help us get back to normal conditions? I understand that these vessels that are partly built will not be completed for four years. If the European world does not get back to normal conditions within four years, it will have reached the point of extinction. Why do you want to spend and waste all this money when these facts are admitted? What I want to say is this one thing: We all know that the outstanding scandal of the World War was the cost plus 10 per cent contracts. It was an outrage on the people and an outrage on the intelligence and patriotism of the country that any party or administration should permit anything so thoroughly asinine, so thoroughly unbusinesslike, as these cost-plus contracts. I am amazed, indeed, that the Committee on Naval Affairs, who have had such long experience and have done such splendid work, should sit here and be willing to perpetuate what is universally regarded an imposition on the people by permitting this cost plus 10 per cent to continue. I call that kind of a thing not only graft but something which approximates treason. In Pennsylvania graft like that in the so-called capitol steal of the State several men went to the penitentiary and three committed suicide. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], brave and brilliant as he stood here yesterday, will not back away, as he seems to be doing, but put up something that does mean something and thereby meet the challenge of the Democratic side, which seems glad to pass the odium of the 10 per cent business to a Republican administration.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I am rather in sympathy with the idea contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. I think it is pretty near time in this country that we stopped the cost-plus contracts. But I am thinking of the effect of the amendment of the gentleman on present contracts. The gentleman from Kansas wanted to know the effect of the cancellation of the contracts where work is under way. The committee tells us that in some yards, like that of the New York Shipbuilding Co., hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent to extend the ways in order to build the big dreadnoughts and battle cruisers. Undoubtedly a lot of ships' keels have been laid and the construction is now under way; they are partly built. Just imagine the effect of canceling contracts where millions or hundreds of millions have been expended on the program. Who is going to take the ships off the ways? What kind of a contract can you enter into with the New York Shipbuilding Co. or the Newport News Co., or any other big company capable of building these large vessels, when the construction has been practically under way and partly completed? If they agree that you shall have the right to cancel the contract, who is going to complete the ships?

I am not in favor of cost-plus contracts. I would like to have the amendment provide that no new contracts be entered into on the part of the Navy or any other branch of the Government, but I am afraid with this amendment you will never get your ships completed. You will have them partly completed and you will have to settle with these companies at the expense of hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman knows that the Government paid all the money for the construction of the ways and that we are paying 10 per cent on the cost of the ways to the contractor.

Mr. NOLAN. I am in favor of the principle contained in the gentleman's amendment, but I am afraid that the Government will pay dearly for completing the ships already started. I am looking at it from the practical standpoint. I will support any amendment that will stop the cost plus 10 per cent proposition, but do not do something that will cost hundreds of millions of dollars on contracts that are partly completed. You could not take these partly completed vessels off the ways.

Mr. GARLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I will.

Mr. GARLAND. Is it not true that it has been usual in all kinds of work where the contractor fails that another contractor comes in and completes the contract and finishes the job. Now, why could not that apply as well here?

Mr. NOLAN. That applies all right if you are building a public building on public ground, but here the vessels that are under construction are built on the ways in a shipyard. You are building the vessel on private property, on private ways, and you can not bring somebody else into that shipyard from the outside to complete the ship. I am in favor of the principle of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois if he will make it apply generally and not to contracts under way. If he makes it apply to any Government construction for the Navy that is not yet under construction, I will support the amendment, because I am in favor of the principle, but you can not do it and save any money to the Government of the United States in contracts that are partially completed, unless you can take the vessels off the yards and transport them to some other yard

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I made a mistake in a statement I made a little while ago and I want to make it right. It shows how weak one's memory is. We did authorize by an act of Congress the construction of one of these cruisers on the cost-plus plan. I can not find at this time that we authorized the other five on a cost-plus plan.

Mr. PADGETT. There was subsequent legislation.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, there are just a few words that I think ought to be said at this time about the cost-plus contract system, giving an idea which has not been expressed, or at least no emphasis has been laid upon it in the numerous discussions that have been had in the House and elsewhere concerning it.

Now, as to the cost-plus proposition, as a principle of business, under anything like normal conditions, the judgment of the mass of men is probably instinctively and intuitively against it. It is a fact, however, that many large construction companies, if I have been correctly informed, even prior to the war, were insisting on this character of contracts, and would make no other kind.

It has seemed to me always to present some features fundamentally objectionable. There were differences of opinion in the various departments as to the soundness of the policy. In my experience as a member of one of the investigating committees of the present Congress, we found there were many differences of opinion in the departments. Some of the officials in the War Department looked with favor upon the cost-plus system, while others were opposed to it. The differences of opinion existed there just as they existed elsewhere. I say this particularly in view of the assertion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] that the outstanding scandal of the war was this cost-plus contract system. I think it should be emphasized, and I think that people should not be permitted to forget that that was the only way in most instances whereby the department could secure the doing of the great work that had to be done. And why? Because the contractors desired to graft upon the Government? I do not think so at all; I do not so asperse the contractors. There may have been instances in which such a thing was desired, but every man knows——

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman knows that grafting was done. The war is over, and while the necessity may have prevailed during the war, does it prevail now?

Mr. GARRETT. That is not what the gentleman said awhile ago, nor was he then speaking of the present. He asserted that the great outstanding scandal of the war was the cost-plus contract system. I do not believe that was any scandal. The fact is that these great construction companies were absolutely unable to determine a basis upon which they could bid for the Government work. Take these great cantonments, these immense plants costing millions and millions of dollars, like the nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals, Ala., for instance, which comes to my mind. What contractor, what man, what builder in this country could have determined at that time a basis upon which to bid for it? With the cost of material changing every day, going up steadily in price, with the cost of labor changing every week, going up and up in price, no man could have made a contract—that is, one which he could have fulfilled after he had made it. If he had based bids on the labor and material price conditions which prevailed in the early part of 1917, or even in the latter part of 1917, on one of these immense plants that could not be completed for 8 or 10 months—if he had made that the basis of his bids, he would have gone into bankruptcy because of the increase in the cost of materials and the increase in the cost of labor. He would have gone into bankruptcy and the Government would have been left in the lurch, its war activities paralyzed. That much I think ought to be said. I think that the people of this country should be told the facts concerning it. While as a normal proposition, where there is a safe basis upon which to estimate a bid, I do not believe in the soundness of the cost-plus system, yet I know that that was the only way during those times of stress and storm, with the constantly changing conditions and fluctuating prices, by which it was possible for this Government to do those things necessary for the winning of the great struggle in which we were engaged, and I am not willing that the great masses of the people of this country should have doubt aroused as to their country's administration when it was doing its best under the great strain that confronted it. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be well if we would get down a little nearer to the real facts with reference to these contracts. Gentlemen have asserted that all of these ships covered by cost-plus contracts are under construction. I do not know where they get their authority for that. It is not so stated in the hearings. The vessels that are covered by the cost-plus contracts are these monster battle cruisers. Two of them are being constructed in Government yards and will not be affected by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], and if all of them were I do not know whether I would be willing to vote for it, because I feel the need of constructing some of these ships. There are two of them to be constructed in the Government yards. There are four others to be constructed outside, and what is said with reference to the progress upon these ships? Admiral Taylor stated, on page 852 of the hearings, as follows:

Of the battle cruisers, No. 1, the Lexington, is being built by the Fore River Co., at Fore River; Nos. 2 and 4, the Constellation and Ranger, at Newport News; No. 3, the Saratoga, by the New York Shipbuilding Co.; and Nos. 5 and 6, the Constitution and the United States, at the Philadelphia Navy Yard. They are all practically in the same condition. The plans have reached the point where material has been ordered and some of it is being received, but no progress has been reported except a fraction of 1 per cent on the Saratoga, being built by the New York Shipbuilding Co., up to February 1.

Mr. JUUL. What is the date of that hearing?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. February 20, 1920. I think it appears very clearly that even if work should be stopped as a result of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois—and if stopped I think it would only be for a very short time—that the construction of these two mammoth ships, these leviathans, could go on in the Government yards. As to the other four, they might have to wait until the right kind of contracts could be made, and a contract could be made at the present time that would not admit of all of the graft and scandals we have had in connection with the cost-plus contracts during the war.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that nobody would take these battle cruisers and build them in any other way. There has never been such a ship built in this world, and the builders will not undertake construction under such conditions as exist now.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. These ships are only a little larger and somewhat more powerful than the English battle cruiser Hood, which has already been constructed. I do not know any reason why contractors at the present time would not take them, although I can see very easily why during the war they would not; but as far as I am concerned, if work on these ships was temporarily suspended until we could find out a little more whether the great arks are going to be successful, I would not care much.

Mr. HUSTED. Does the gentleman really think that under existing conditions of labor and material costs that any man would make a contract at a fixed price, unless that price was absolutely beyond all reason and beyond all acceptance, to build a battleship which it would take four years to complete?

Mr. MONTAGUE. And, further, is it not a fact that these contracts are already let?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. These contracts are let on the cost-plus system.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Are they not let under the cost-plus system?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think, however, there is a provision in the contract by which they can be canceled.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If they are let under the cost-plus system, whether it be wise or unwise to do it, is there not something above wisdom—namely, conscience—that should compel us to keep our contracts?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly; if the contract is not drawn so it can be canceled; and while I have not examined these contracts recently my understanding is there is such a provision, so that they should be canceled.

Mr. LITTLE. Did the gentleman notice what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] said about having made a mistake in reference to contracts being let on the cost-plus system, and he said that only one had been contracted?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I thank the gentleman from Kansas for the correction. I was following the first statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. PADGETT. If I may have the attention of the committee for a moment, I call the attention of the chairman of the committee that he is too hasty in making the admission.

Mr. BUTLER. It may be.

Mr. PADGETT. On August 29, 1916, we authorized six battle cruisers.

Mr. BUTLER. I recall.

Mr. PADGETT. And here is the provision:

That if in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy the most rapid and economical construction of the battle cruisers authorized herein can be obtained thereby in a contract for the construction of any or all of them upon the basis of actual cost plus a reasonable profit to be determined by him.

That especially provides for all of them.

Mr. BUTLER. Is that 1916?

Mr. PADGETT. August 29.

Mr. BUTLER. I was looking at 1917.

Mr. PADGETT. Nineteen hundred and seventeen simply provided for one additional one and just repeated for the one appropriating for. Now, I want to call attention to another matter.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will.

Mr. NOLAN. Does the gentleman know that the Navy Department has contracted on the cost-plus basis for 30 or 40 submarines in San Francisco?

Mr. PADGETT. I did not know about that.

Mr. NOLAN. So they must have authority some way other than the authority cited by the gentleman.

Mr. PADGETT. I am speaking of battle cruisers; I am not speaking of submarines now. Now, there has been a lot said with reference to the cost-plus contract. The Navy Department tried to get a contract on that basis and could not get a bid. It advertised for bids and could not get a single one. The only contract they could get was a cost plus. I want to call attention to another fact, that the Navy Department did not make any contract for a cost plus at 10 per cent. They had a graduated contract lower than 10 per cent, had a maximum limit of profit in addition to the cost, and I want to say again that with all the criticism that has been made I have not found any criticism of the Navy on its cost-plus contracts.

Mr. RICKETTS. Can the gentleman tell us whether any contracts were made since the armistice was signed for the building of ships?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know it has.

Mr. RICKETTS. The committee had some hearings in reference to when the contracts were let?

Mr. PADGETT. I did not know when the contracts were made. Two of them are to be built in the Philadelphia Navy Yard, and two, I believe, at the New York Ship Building plant, and two at Newport News.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say to my friend this, that the Navy Department had to coax these contractors to take them. Only last fall the ways were completed, and there has been great hesitation by competent people. They had to beg these men to take these ships.

Mr. RICKETTS. Were any contracts made last fall?

Mr. BUTLER. Well, I can not tell. The ways were only finished last fall, and I can not tell when the contracts were made; I wish I could, but I do not know. I think the battleships have been made a year or two, and we had to increase the cost—no; they were the big cruisers——

Mr. PADGETT. The battleships were all being built on the flat contract price. It is only the battle cruisers that they could get no contract or bid on?

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that he understands that these ships weigh 42,000 tons.

Mr. PADGETT. The battle cruisers 32,000 tons and the battleships 42,000.

Mr. BUTLER. And they have 180,000 horsepower in them.

Mr. MADDEN. What difference does that make?

Mr. BUTLER. Nobody would make a bid.

Mr. MADDEN. No, sir; the bigger they are the easier they are to get people to bid on them.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. That debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted under the rule of the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman got five minutes, and I want him to yield for a question. I notice the gentleman raised three facts in connection with the act authorizing the cost-plus contract. I think he omitted a very material fact; and that is that the gentleman from Illinois voted for the bill that authorized the cost-plus contract, and he should have made objection then instead of voting for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were—ayes 29, noes 81.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk finished reading the bill.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 6 of the bill——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment right at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULL of Iowa: Page 47, line 28, after the word "expenditure," insert: "That no part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch, or other time-measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee, in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant; and that no part of the moneys appropriated in each or any section of this act shall be used or expended for the purchase or acquirement of any article or articles that, at the time of the proposed acquirement, can be manufactured or produced in each or any of the Government navy yards of the United States, when time and facilities permit for a sum less than it can be purchased or acquired otherwise."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], is the language of this amendment the same as that which has heretofore been offered, agreed to, and ruled upon? Does the gentleman know?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is the same language. It is cut right out of the bill of last year.

The CHAIRMAN. That the Chair knew.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not sure it has been ruled on, however.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. What the Chair wants is to get the information.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the language of this is identical with the amendment known as the Tavenner amendment, except it adds to it the provision that no material or manufactured article shall be bought outside that can be produced by the navy yards at their own cost. That is an addition to what is known as the Tavenner amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is another which has been frequently agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. They are coupled together.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words in regard to the amendment. I hope that no Member of the House thinks I am trying to hamper the naval officials in putting efficiency into the navy yards. I am not. This prohibition is simply a prohibition of the Taylor system. The language is the identical language that has been used on the naval bill, the Army bill, and the fortification bill, for five or six years, since 1914, and it simply prohibits the Taylor system. I want to explain to you briefly what the Taylor system is. That system is not a scheme that produces efficiency. There is not a Member of this House that would work under the Taylor system.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. What for? A question?

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman know that his amendment goes beyond the Taylor system and absolutely prohibits the use of any instrument to state the time the man puts on his job?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I know that this is the amendment that was agreed to to prohibit the Taylor system in the arsenals and navy yards of this country, and it got by the point of order and has been put on the bills, as I said before, for eight years. It simply prohibits the Taylor system. The Taylor system is a scheme, I think, purely theoretical, of a board of engineers whose idea was that they could tell every individual how to perform his task better than he knew himself, although he might have worked 20 or 30 years at his trade. They selected a man who was young and who could produce a certain article at a less time than the older men.

The result was this, that if 100 men were working in a factory, they went in there, and they found the man that produced that article at the very least time. They studied that and timed his movements. Then they went over to another workman, and they said, "Look here; you are taking too much time. You should do it this way." Perhaps the man used his left hand first. They said, "You start with your right hand. This man is doing it that way, and he does it quicker than you can do it." The effect of it was that in every factory in which it has ever been introduced it produced inefficiency. Now, what was the result? This board of engineers tried to put this into the private factories of the country and did not succeed. Labor resented it. I would have resented it. The time was when I had to work at manual labor and had to do as the foreman said, but he was a human being at least and not a machine-made slave driver. But no foreman ever stood over me with a stop watch and told me that he could tell me how to do a certain task better than I could figure it out myself. They never put it wholly into any factory in this country, so far as I know; perhaps they did part of it. They went to the Ordnance Department of this Government some 15 or 20 years ago, and they got them to take it up and try to put it into the arsenals. It resulted in inefficiency in your arsenals, and labor resented it, and it increased the overhead cost very materially. Then, friends of labor came to Congress, and you put that provision on the bill, and it has been there ever since. I have been trying to find out how to produce efficiency in the arsenals. Two years ago we put an amendment on to the bill, which is the last three lines of this amendment, and that has been producing efficiency in your arsenals. Already it has cut down the overhead expense over 50 per cent, and it simply says to the workingmen in the yards and in the arsenals, "You must compete on a cost basis with outside manufacturers; if you can not make an article for less than they do, the work will go to them, and you are the loser of that much in wages."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask whether or not the gentleman's amendment has been O. K'd by Mr. Gompers?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, this is the same amendment that we have had before us several times, and each and every time the gentlemen who advocate it hide behind the so-called Taylor system. They have used this Taylor system as a smoke screen, so to speak, to justify a limitation of this kind. But this amendment goes much further than the Taylor system and absolutely prohibits officials of the Government from making, with any kind of a time-measuring device, any sort of a time study of what the Government employee does. Now, let us read what the amendment says:

> That no appropriation made in this bill shall be available for the salary and pay of any officer—
> And so forth—
> while making or causing to be made with a stop watch or other time-measuring device—
> And so forth, covering every conceivable means by which you may make a time study with a time-measuring device.

Now, not long ago we had before the House a proposition to give a deficiency appropriation for the Bureau of Yards and Docks of the Navy, and I read the hearings on that proposition, and I recall that members of the committee asked Admiral Parks and Assistant Secretary Roosevelt if it were not true that the efficiency of the navy-yard employees had fallen off very substantially. I recall that Admiral Parks made a startling comparison of the cost of putting up timberwork, carpenter work, in the Norfolk district prior to and during the war. He stated that prior to the war the cost of doing the work was $24 or $25 per thousand, and that during the war it run up to $160 per thousand. The wage increase had been but 80 per cent, therefore there had been a heavy decline in efficiency. I recall also that Assistant Secretary Roosevelt admitted a substantial decline in the efficiency of labor at the navy yards. He said:

> Last summer my own personal guess—and that is what you might call it—was that we were somewhere between 65 and 70 per cent efficient; that is, we were turning out per day per man 65 or 70 per cent of what we turned out in 1914.

Some member of the committee asked him this question:

> Why do not the officials of the Government make a study of the efficiency of these employees?

And I recall that Mr. Roosevelt answered as follows:

> We do not keep time cards and are not allowed to do so by Congress.

The above testimony which I have quoted will be found on page 333 of the hearings on the second deficiency appropriation bill for the fiscal year of 1920. This testimony tells its own story, and I would be ashamed to look my constituents in the face after having read it and tell them that I had voted for such a proposition as the Hull amendment.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] made the statement that an efficiency system was tried out in the arsenals of the War Department and that it proved a failure. I say to you that his information is not in accordance with the statement of Secretary Baker or of Gen. Crozier, who was then Chief of Ordnance. When this same amendment was before Congress once before I read a letter that Secretary Baker had written to the Hon. CHAMP CLARK, Speaker of the House, and I now want to again refer to it. Here is what Mr. Baker says about this efficiency method which had then been installed in the arsenals of the War Department. Secretary Baker said:

> The wages paid to our operatives in the Watertown Arsenal at a flat rate, irrespective of their response to the time system, is the current rate of the community for similar work, and, in addition to that, premiums are offered—not large, but large enough to stimulate continuance and faithful activity. So far as I know, there is not a case on record at Watertown, since the introduction of this system, of a nervous breakdown or physical exhaustion due to excessive work, nor is it claimed that the operatives in that plant, protected as they are against long hours by a wise eight-hour provision, are in any sense driven or hurried beyond a fair and safe limit.

Secretary Baker also states in his letter that each employee of the Watertown Arsenal on premium jobs had earned an average of $10.66 increase in wages per month by increased efficiency.

And then he closes his letter with these words:

> To prohibit the system of which the record shows undoubted advantages both to the Government and to the employees because of a charge unsupported by evidence or even by attempted evidence—for there has been no effort to prove overwork at the Watertown Arsenal—seems to be most unwise.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is worse than unwise. It is, in my opinion, downright stupidity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. Debate on this amendment has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FESS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3867. An act authorizing the State of New Mexico to apply the proceeds of the grant to said State of 1,000,000 acres of land made by section 7 of the enabling act, June 20, 1910, for the reimbursement of Grant County, Luna County, Hidalgo County, Santa Fe County, and the town of Silver City, N. Mex.;

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12467) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2085) relating to the maintenance of actions for death on the high seas and other navigable waters.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 1865. An act for the relief of the Baltimore Dry Docks & Shipbuilding Co., owner of a dry dock at Baltimore, Md.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, the debate on this subject has been very extensive in the House at various times, but I would like to call the attention of the members of the committee to the fact that the Committee on Labor held extensive hearings in the Sixty-fourth Congress in connection with the Tavenner bill. We had before us at that time Gen. Crozier, Chief of Ordnance of the War Department. We had before us also practically every one of the so-called efficiency engineers in this country. We had before us also the opponents of the Taylor or stop-watch system. No man could read the hearings on that subject, no matter what his mind might be on this particular matter, and get the idea that there was any such thing as efficiency—I mean real, simon-pure efficiency in this system.

In the first place, it starts off by the introduction of a stop watch. It studies the movements of the individual by the split second, and then tries to determine exactly what that man's task shall be, for a given time on a certain given piece of work.

It is an attempt to fix the base pay that the men shall get. In addition to that it attempts to fix a so-called premium or bonus system. Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], who was a member of the committee that investigated that matter at that time, put a simple question to the gentlemen who were here favoring the introduction of the Taylor system, or so-called scientific management. He asked one of them this question: Suppose a shoe factory brought in one of your experts to introduce this so-called system of scientific management, and as an illustration it was found that a shoemaker who was making four pairs of shoes a day received for those four pairs of shoes $8, and suppose that expert fixed the task at eight pairs of shoes a day, tell this committee what that man would get for the ninth pair of shoes.

It took an hour and a half before that witness felt at liberty to answer that question, because he did not want the committee to know what those who favored this system had in their minds.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Just a minute. They finally admitted that if the man made the ninth pair of shoes he would get anywhere from 33⅓ cents to 50 cents, although he got $1 for each of the other eight pair. Now, that gives some idea of the premium or bonus system. I can take the hearings and give you illustrations. It is easy to prove the fallacy of this system. All you have to do is to look at those hearings. The system does nothing but produce discontent among the employees, and wherever you have discontent you have inefficiency.

I am not opposed to scientific management. You must have some sort of management in a shop, but it has got to be common-sense management, whether it is in the Government service or in private employment. You can not do it with stop-watch methods. That is the basis of the Taylor system and the Emerson system and the Gantt system and every other form of this so-called scientific management.

Mr. BLACK. Now will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. BUTLER. In 1915 we first inserted in the naval appropriation bill the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL]. I voted for it then and I have voted for it every year since then, and I do not propose now to vote against it, for I think it is only fair toward the men that they should not be watched. The older I grow the more I am opposed to a system of spying and watching. I believe that if men are put upon their honor, as they are in the Baldwin Locomotive Works in my congressional district, where there never has been any trouble with the men, they will do a fair day's work.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman think there is anything wrong in an official of the Government, who is a foreman of a Government yard, permitting a time study of what his men are doing?

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no.

Mr. BLACK. Does not this amendment absolutely prohibit the use of any time-measuring device of any conceivable nature?

Mr. BUTLER. I have always conceived this to be a provision against what is known as the Taylor system. I never cared for that. I always thought it authorized the superintendent at a mill or yard to use some sort of a stop clock upon the men to see whether or not they were doing a full day's work. Now, the Secretary of the Navy has written me a letter, which I hold in my hand. In that letter he tells me he is surprised that the paragraph is not in the bill. It is not in the bill because the department struck it out, as I understand. It was not in the first print of the bill when it came to us. I do not ask anyone to vote for it or anyone to vote against it. I have simply made this statement because I hold in my hand the letter of the Secretary of the Navy. He says it is a provision in the Army bill.

Mr. PADGETT and Mr. BLANTON rose.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

Mr. PADGETT. I want to say that in the first committee print of the bill that legislation is always stricken out.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I will.

Mr. NOLAN. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if the Secretary of the Navy does not recommend the reinsertion of the stop-watch section of the bill?

Mr. BUTLER. The Secretary of the Navy recommends that it shall be inserted in the bill; not all of it, but the stop-watch part of it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I hope that every member of this committee will read the letter from Hon. Herbert D. Brown, Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency of this Government, which I placed in the RECORD on March 5, 1920. That letter discloses that there is a want of efficiency in the administration of affairs in the Government by its employees more than anything else, because of the fact that the demands of the organization to which our Government employees belong are forever and eternally calling on Congress to put restrictions and limitations around the administration of affairs, so that efficiency is absolutely impossible.

Read that letter. It is an eye opener to us, and here is this amendment of the gentleman from Iowa coming from those same organizations, demanded by those same organizations, upheld by their proponents in this House, asking us to place other restrictions around the governmental authorities, so as to keep out even a minimum degree of efficiency.

How much further are we going? Each time the rule is enlarged upon and the restrictions are increased we are placing greater hampers around every Government official to prevent efficiency and not to increase it. We can keep on doing it because the employees' organizations demand it of us, and we keep on complying with their requests. The record which my colleague from Texas [Mr. BLACK] called your attention to a moment ago shows beyond peradventure of a doubt that this amendment should not be passed if we are looking after the best interests of the people of this country. Of course if we are just carrying out the demands and requests and wants of the organized Government employees, we will pass this amendment, like we always pass what they want. But the time is coming some of these days as sure as you and I are on this floor now when we are going to have to turn down some of these demands and vote for the good of all the people. We are going to require the highest state of efficiency on the part of every employee some of these days. The time to do that is now. If this proposed amendment is a good thing to do, why did not the distinguished committee put it in the bill? The committee worked faithfully on the bill weeks and months, and they have accomplished much in the way of economy, and I compliment the distinguished chairman. If I can, I am going to force a roll call record vote on this Hull amendment. And then are you going to vote for the organized Government employees or for all the people?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the following language in the Hull amendment: "Or other time-saving devices."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLACK to the amendment of Mr. HULL: Strike out on the fifth line the words "or other time-saving devices."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard just a minute. The chief reason urged as an objection to this amendment is that it places the stop watch over an employee. Now, if the House wants to prohibit the use of the stop watch, very well, we may do it, although I do not think it has ever been abused in Government work. But the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] is so broad that it absolutely prohibits the Government officials from making any time study of the work done by these employees in the navy yards or the arsenals. If my amendment is adopted, it leaves the prohibition as to the stop watch, but the Government will be left free to use some other kind of a time-measuring device. Surely we do not want to so tie the hands of Government supervisory officials that they can make no time study of the work of a particular employee.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. I think the gentleman is on the right track. With his amendment I will vote for the proposition, but without it I will vote against it.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I want just a minute. If the amendment is adopted it leaves the door open to other speed-up time-saving devices. Every latter-day investigator regarding management has come to the conclusion that wherever scientific shop management is introduced the human element is to be considered, and you can not consider it if you adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, because it means that if you do not take the split-second stop watch, you might take some other kind of a stop watch.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NOLAN) there were 58 ayes and 58 noes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. HULL of Iowa and Mr. BLACK.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 65.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by Mr. HULL of Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 67, noes 52.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 6 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to return to page 6 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment, which the Clerk will report for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER: Page 6, line 22, after the word "aeroplanes," insert a new paragraph, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to accept from King County, Wash., free from any encumbrances and conditions, without cost to the United States Government, a certain tract of land containing 250 acres, more or less, at Sand Point, for use as an aviation base.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning for the purpose of offering the amendment which has been read?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the gentleman making a statement, but I shall make the point of order to that amendment when it comes up.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object to save time.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentleman would withhold his objection until I can make a statement.

Mr. BLANTON. Very well, I withhold the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas reserves the right to object.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, after this bill was formulated and on the same day it was reported to the House the authorities at Seattle telegraphed me their desire to tender to the Government 250 acres of land as an aviation base, which tract of land has been selected by the Helm Board as an aviation base. I forwarded the request immediately to the Secretary of the Navy and to the Chief of the Bureau of Operations of the Navy, and I now send to the desk the letters which I received from those gentlemen regarding this offer, which I ask unanimous consent to have read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letters in the time of the gentleman from Washington.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Hon. JOHN F. MILLER, M. C.,
Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MILLER: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of March 17, 1920, with telegram inclosed.

The Navy is deeply appreciative of the generous offer made by the people of Seattle. I trust that legislation may be enacted which will permit the Navy to avail itself of their kind offer. Inclosed herewith is a copy of a letter written by the Secretary of the Navy to the chairman of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee on this subject.

Very truly, yours,

R. E. COONTZ,
Admiral, United States Navy.

MARCH 18, 1920.

Senator C. S. PAGE,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have to invite your attention to a copy of a telegram from the Seattle Chamber of Commerce addressed to the Hon. JOHN F. MILLER, forwarded herewith, together with a copy of Mr. MILLER'S letter to Admiral Coontz.

The site mentioned in the telegram from the Chamber of Commerce of Seattle has been inspected by naval officers and is deemed the most desirable for the purposes of naval aviation of any to be found in this region. In the no-distant future aviation facilities permitting the use of seaplanes on the part of the Navy will become absolutely necessary in this vicinity.

In view of the extremely generous offer of the chamber of commerce, I have to urge that a provision be inserted in the naval appropriation bill, which is about to be considered by your committee, which will permit the Government to accept this land without cost or obligation at this time.

Very truly, yours, JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I renew the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MANN of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13108, the naval appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote upon the Hull amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands a separate vote upon the Hull amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk again reported the Hull amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Speaker take the vote upon the other amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendments? If not, the Chair will put the other amendments en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], on which the gentleman from Texas demands a separate vote.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 74, noes 47.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the House having divided, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. To-morrow, I believe, is Calendar Wednesday. If the House should adjourn now, with the previous question ordered, would this matter come up before Thursday?

The SPEAKER. It would come up on Thursday morning. The Chair will count. It is apparent that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 222, nays 70, answered "present" 1, not voting 135, as follows:

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. O'CONNELL, continued, on account of illness of his wife.

To Mr. GOLDFOGLE, continued, on account of illness.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request at the instance of my colleague.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas withdraws the request. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 223, noes 13.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the governor of the State of Idaho announcing the ratification by the legislature of that State of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who spoke on the naval bill may have five legislative days in which to extend and revise their remarks on the bill only.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that those who spoke on the bill may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill.

Mr. GARD. To be their own remarks?

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, yes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I believe we have granted that sort of permission several times before, and it has not been observed, and therefore I object.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday it may be in order to consider bills not objected to on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that on Thursday the bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to may be considered.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. The next bill before the House will be the District appropriation bill, and it occurred to me it would be better to continue the consideration of that bill after it came in rather than to have it come in on Thursday and then have the bills on the Private Calendar considered Friday. Therefore I am making the request to consider bills on the Private Calendar on Thursday rather than on Friday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming whether or not if this agreement is made, that after the calendar is called and finished then it would be permissible under this agreement to take up bills that have been objected to on that day and consider them?

Mr. MONDELL. I think not. That would be my opinion.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it the understanding that they would not be taken up unless unobjected to?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They could not be taken up, because it is not regular Private Calendar Day.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I will not object.

LATE REPRESENTATIVE THOMAS J. STEELE.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, late yesterday evening I received a telegram informing me of the sudden death of Hon. Thomas J. Steele, a Member of this House in the Sixty-fourth Congress from the eleventh congressional district of Iowa. The eleventh Iowa district has always been strongly Republican, and was never represented by a Democrat except during the Sixty-fourth Congress by Mr. Steele.

I did not have an opportunity to make the acquaintance of Mr. Steele until the fall of 1915. It so happened that both of us came to Washington several weeks before the opening of the regular session to look over the ground. We soon met and found much in common, including our views on public questions. A strong friendship grew up between us, which I cherished and valued very highly.

Mr. Steele was reared amidst the hardships of pioneer life in Iowa. He knew the Middle West and its problems. He was a successful business man and farmer. While in this House, he was a member of the great Committee on Agriculture, where he served with ability and distinction.

Mr. Steele was one of the strong and influential men of the State of Iowa. He had the confidence and respect of his friends and all who knew him. With him a public office was a public trust to be administered for the best interests and welfare of all the people. He will be remembered for his sterling character, courage, earnest devotion to duty, and splendid public service. The news of his death brings deep sorrow to all his friends and especially to his colleagues who served with him in the Sixty-fourth Congress.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, March 24, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 24, 1920.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, March 23, 1920.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon, on the expiration of the recess.

WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment concerning a subject which is naturally attracting much public attention at this time. I refer to the House resolution the purpose of which is to declare peace between the United States and Germany. This morning's Post informs the public that—

> After a conference yesterday between Senator LODGE and Representative PORTER, chairmen of the Senate and House Committees on Foreign Relations, the conviction grew among Members of both parties in Congress that President Wilson will not be able to prevent an end being made to the existing state of technical war between the United States and Germany. A simple resolution, separate from the Versailles treaty, declaring a state of peace, it was claimed yesterday, will pass both Houses by large majorities, and, according to the present outlook, may reach the two-thirds necessary under the Constitution to override a presidential veto.

Mr. President, I am as heartily and anxiously in favor of the establishment of actual peace between the United States and the Central Empires at the earliest possible moment as any man can be. I am more than willing to stretch any doubt regarding the power of Congress to enact such a resolution as that referred to in the article from which I just read and entertain the resolution. But I am fairly well convinced that the Congress possesses no such authority under the Constitution, and my apology for intruding the subject upon the attention of the Senate this morning is solely due to the fact that there seems to be a general and rapidly growing impression that we have that power and should exercise it. Hence, if the impression be unchallenged and it should then be developed that no such authority is devolved upon Congress a resulting disappointment must follow for those who look confidently to an early period when, by act of Congress, a technical state of war will no longer exist.

There are but three known ways of effecting peace, if the authorities upon international law are reliable. One is by conquest, another by negotiation, and a third by abandonment of hostilities, and none of these even hint at the existence of legislative power in America to so declare. Doubtless the House of Commons should possess that power, as it is the custodian of the superme sovereignty of the British Empire. But no such power inheres in the American Congress.

The subject seems to have escaped the consideration of writers upon international law, doubtless because of the very proper assumption that no such authority exists.

I had occasion when the Knox resolution was introduced to devote a little time to an investigation of the subject, as it then occurred to me that such a power was entirely inconsistent with the right to wage war and with the powers of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

The proceedings of the Constitutional Convention were secret. The only record of its deliberations is the diary of Madison, together with some fugitive reports of discussions here in Yates's Secret Debates. But a little information upon the subject is to be secured from them.

Mr. Madison says that, on August 17, on the motion for adding "and peace" after "war," it was unanimously negatived, the motion, of course, being to amend the phrase to declare war by adding "and peace," so that if adopted the amended clause would read "to declare war and peace."

In volume 1 of Elliott's Debates, page 246, is this recital:

> It was moved and seconded to add the words "and to make peace" to the fourteenth clause, which passed unanimously in the negative.

I gather from this recital that the original proposal upon the subject embodied the word "make" in place of the word "declare," because this report continues:

> On motion to insert "declare" in place of "make," the vote was 8 affirmative to 1 negative.

Mr. Madison's note reads:

> Connecticut voted in the negative; but on the remark by Mr. King that "make" war might be understood to "conduct" it, which was an Executive function, Mr. Ellsworth gave up his objection and the vote was changed to "aye."

Mr. Ellsworth's note reads as follows:

> There is a material difference between the cases of making war and making peace. It should be more easy to get out of war than into it.

I may inject here the opinion that if Mr. Ellsworth had lived well into the twentieth century he would have been disabused of that impression. He continued:

> War also is a simple and overt declaration; peace is attended with intricate and secret negotiations.

It appears, therefore, Mr. President, that the question was actually considered by the Constitutional Convention while framing that document, and that the effort to invest Congress with the power to make peace concurrently with the power to declare war not only failed but was ultimately rejected by the unanimous verdict of all the delegates.

In the Federalist I find this reference to the subject, which is indirect. I read an extract from the Federalist, No. 74, by Hamilton:

> The President of the United States is to be "Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States." The propriety of this provision is so evident in itself and it is at the same time so consonant to the precedents of the State constitutions in general that little need be said to explain or enforce it. Even those of them which have in other respects coupled the Chief Magistrate with a council have for the most part concentrated the military authority in him alone. Of all the cares or concerns of government, the direction of war most peculiarly demands those qualities which distinguish the exercise of power by a single hand. The direction of war implies the direction of the common strength, and the power of directing and employing the common strength forms a usual and essential part in the definition of the Executive authority."

In Paul Leicester Ford's edition of the Federalist is this note of comment on above:

In this brief paragraph is dismissed the gravest problem which our Government has yet encountered regarding the presidential power. Had Mr. Bagehot investigated with any care the history of the wars of 1812 and 1861 he would probably have found our Government sufficiently "elastic," for, as Mr. Bryce remarks, the powers of the President in war time, "and especially in civil war," expand with "portentous speed." Indeed, Lincoln went so far as to assert that "as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in time of war I suppose I have the right to take any measures which may best subdue the enemy."

Of course I assume that the resolutions which formed the subject of press comment are joint and not concurrent. Indeed, they could be nothing else, and be considered at all, since the resolution declaring war was a joint resolution approved by the President in April, 1917, thus requiring a similar resolution to repeal it. If that be so, of course the presidential approval is essential to the resolution. Of course peace by joint resolution approved by the Executive, who has the sole power to wage war, is entirely feasible.

I have been, as I said, led to submit these considerations to the Senate solely because of the impression that seems to be gaining ground in the public mind that Congress is endowed, among other things, with the power to make peace wholly independent of the Executive, either because it is an essential part of its authority or because it is necessarily implied in our power to declare war; an impression without foundation, in my judgment, and calculated to mislead the public judgment to our detriment if it shall remain unchallenged.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 13108) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ABOLITION OF HOUSING CORPORATION.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I wish to clear up a parliamentary situation between the two Houses.

On December 17 a bill—H. R. 7656—passed the House abolishing the United States Housing Corporation. It was sent to this body and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported another bill, which passed the Senate, S. 3738.

What I wish to do is to report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds House bill 7656 with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the text of Senate bill 3738, as reported favorably from that committee.

Mr. SMOOT. And the Senator asks unanimous consent for its consideration?

Mr. FERNALD. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be put upon its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which he has just reported. Is there objection?

Mr. GRONNA. If the consideration of the bill leads to no debate, I have no objection.

Mr. FERNALD. It certainly can lead to no discussion, for a similar bill has already passed the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7656) to repeal the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, and to provide for the disposition of all property acquired under and by virtue of the same, reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the power and authority to provide housing, local transportation, and other general community utilities as granted by sections 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, shall cease and determine as of the date of the approval of this act: Provided, however, That the power and authority granted by the said act of May 16, 1918, to requisition any improved or unimproved land or any right, title, or interest therein, on which houses, buildings, improvements, local transportation, and other general community utilities and parts thereof have been constructed, shall remain vested in the President, to be exercised when necessary to protect the interest of the Government, and to cease with the termination of the war when formally proclaimed by the President.

SEC. 2. That the various offices, bureaus, divisions, and branches of the public service and of the various corporate or other agencies exercising the powers granted by the said act of May 16, 1918, and other acts and parts of acts amendatory theerof, and all that pertains to the same, including such officers, clerks, and employees employed therein, as in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury are necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, also the official records and papers on file in and pertaining to the business of the said offices, bureaus, divisions, and branches of the public service and of the various corporate or other agencies and relating to the exercise of the said powers, together with the furniture, equipment, and supplies used in connection therewith, shall be transferred to the Treasury Department on the 30th day of June, 1920: Provided, That the unexpended balance of any and all appropriations available during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, for the exercise of the power and authority prescribed in said act of May 16, 1918, and other acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, shall continue available for the purposes appropriated, to be expended under the supervision of the Treasury Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury on the 30th day of June, 1920, all property of every character whatsoever acquired under the power and authority granted by the said act of Congress approved May 16, 1918, and other acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, remaining undisposed of on June 30, 1920, together with all deeds, contracts, agreements, mortgages, assignments, notes, stocks, bonds, and other evidence of security or indebtedness: Provided, That the same shall be transferred in such legal form as is required to vest the legal or equitable title in the United States of America for disposal in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. That upon the transfer of the property to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Secretary of Labor as provided for by section 3 of this act the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized—

(a) To sell and convey the real estate, improvements, and furnishings as soon as the same can be advantageously disposed of, and a reasonable effort shall be made to sell the dwelling houses direct to prospective individual home owners who are citizens of the United States, and who desire the houses for their own occupancy: Provided, however, That no sale or conveyance shall be made hereunder on credit without reserving a first lien on such property for the unpaid purchase price: Provided further, That pending the disposal of the said property, the Secretary of the Treasury shall have full power and authority to care for, rent, and operate the same: Provided further, That all deeds, contracts, or other instruments of conveyance executed by the United States Housing Corporation by its duly authorized officer or officers where the legal title to the property in question is in the name of said corporation, and by the United States of America by the Secretary of the Treasury where the title to the property in question is in the name of the United States of America, shall be conclusive evidence of the transfer of title to the property in question according to the purport of such deeds, contracts, or other instruments of conveyance, and in no case shall any purchaser or grantee thereunder be required to see to the application of any purchase money.

(b) To conclude and execute contracts or other obligations made or incurred under the provisions of the said act of Congress approved May 16, 1918, and other acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof; to collect the principal and interest of loans made or other sums due under such contracts or obligations and to take such other steps as are necessary to protect the interest of the Government and to fulfill the obligations duly incurred in carrying out the power and authority granted by the said act and other acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof: Provided, That all moneys received from the disposal of properties or otherwise collected in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 5. That immediately upon the passage of this act, the Secretary of Labor shall cause to be transferred to the Secretary of the Treasury the houses, dormitories, and schoolhouse on the naval reservation at Indianhead, Md.; the houses and schoolhouse on the naval reservation at Charleston, W. Va.; the land located near the Puget Sound Navy Yard, at Bremerton, Wash., with the improvements thereon, consisting of a hotel and apartment house, together with the land purchased by the United States Housing Corporation adjoining the said hotel; the same to be maintained and operated under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That any unexpended balance of the appropriation made for the operation of the said projects by the act of Congress approved July 19, 1919, entitled "An act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," shall immediately upon the transfer of the said projects to the Secretary of the Treasury become available for the purposes appropriated, to be accounted for and audited as funds appropriated for the use of the Treasury Department.

SEC. 6. That section 3 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanitarium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines," approved March 3, 1919, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to transfer without charge to the Secretary of the Treasury for the use of the Public Health Service such hospital furniture and equipment, including hospital and medical supplies, motor trucks, and other motor-driven vehicles, in good condition, not required by the War Department, as may be required by the Public Health Service for its hospitals."

SEC. 7. That immediately upon the passage of this act the Secretary of Labor shall transmit to the Attorney General a full and detailed statement covering transactions of the United States Housing Corporation with architects, contractors, subcontractors, utility companies, and others, in matters covered by the recommendations of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate in the report submitted December 16, 1919, pursuant to S. Res. 210 (Rept. No. 336), and if in the opinion of the Attorney General such action would be consistent with the best interests of the Government, he shall cause to be instituted the necessary legal proceedings looking toward the recovery of any and all sums of money paid or loaned in excess of amounts legally due the said architects, contractors, subcontractors, utility companies, and others, under the terms of their contracts with the Housing Corporation.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of Labor immediately upon the passage of this act shall cause to be instituted such legal steps as are necessary to wind up the affairs of the United States Housing Corporation, so as to dissolve the said corporation and all other corporate agencies heretofore and now exercising the powers and authority granted by the act of Congress approved May 16, 1918, and other acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, and to make effective on June 30, 1920, the transfer to the Treasury Department provided for by this act: Provided, That on June 30, 1920, the Secretary of Labor shall report to Congress in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 19, 1919, entitled "An act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes" (United States Housing Corporation), and in addition thereto shall furnish a detailed statement showing all real and personal property acquired under and by virtue of the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 16, 1918, and other acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof; showing the use to which each piece of property was applied and showing all property disposed of, together with the cost and the amount received from the sale of the same: Provided further, That the Secretary of Labor shall furnish a copy of the said report to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, merely for the RECORD, I desire to ask the Senator from Maine if this bill is in the identical language of the bill which he states has heretofore passed the Senate?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes, sir; it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. FERNALD. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. FERNALD, Mr. SPENCER, and Mr. TRAMMELL conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE LINCOLN MEMORIAL.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 316) relating to supervision of the Lincoln Memorial. It consists of a few lines, and will, I am sure, occupy no time. I ask for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in the exercise of its control and direction for the construction of the Lincoln Memorial authorized by act of Congress approved February 9, 1911, the commission created by said act shall designate to perform the duty of special resident commissioner, to represent the commission in the oversight of the work, the Hon. John Temple Graves, recently appointed a member of the Lincoln Memorial Commission, as the successor of the Hon. Joseph C. Blackburn, deceased, and for the special service of the member so designated he shall be entitled to receive compensation at the rate of $5,000 per annum out of the appropriations for the construction of such memorial.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,500 for salary of the Librarian of the Senate Library, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAPPER submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for salaries, travel, and other necessary expenses of employees of the Agricultural Department outside the city of Washington engaged in field investigations from $168,076 to $370,000, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for salaries, travel, and other necessary expenses of employees of the Agricultural Department outside the city of Washington engaged in field investigations from $168,076 to $216,562, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HARRISON submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for investigations of insects affecting truck crops, etc., from $110,000 to $131,760, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. GAY submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act of April 26, 1910, known as the insecticide act, from $85,000 to $117,000, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

COTTON IN STORAGE.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I send to the desk a Senate resolution for which I ask immediate consideration. It simply asks for certain information from the Census Bureau, which it is very important the Senate should have.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 340) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Director of the Census is hereby requested to furnish to the Senate at the earliest possible time the number of bales of so-called unspinnable cotton including gin cut, water packed, perished fiber, and linters, in public storage and at concentrating points.

CONGRESSIONAL COMMISSION TO VIRGIN ISLANDS.

Mr. KENYON. I ask that the testimony taken by the commission which was appointed to visit the Virgin Islands be printed, and I ask that the request be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps it would be better to request that the testimony be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it printed as a public document.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to make that request if it is the usual form followed in similar instances.

Mr. SMOOT. It is the usual form.

Mr. KENYON. Then I make the request as suggested by the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request made by the Senator from Iowa is granted, and the testimony will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 13108. An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the subhead "Forest Service," on page 34, line 25, before the word "clerks," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "nineteen" and insert "twenty-six"; on page 35, line 1, before the word "clerks," to strike out "twenty-one" and insert "twenty-eight."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to make a few observations on this measure. I do not know that it is necessary to do so in order to aid its enactment, because I believe that the Senate will pass the bill anyway; but I desire to make some comments in reference to the protection of forests, and incidentally the cooperation between the States and the Federal Government in the use of the Air Service.

This bill very properly takes care of the forests in the several States of the Union, and on page 98 it proposes to add to the amount provided for in the bill as it came from the House for the cooperation of the Federal Government with the States.

As the bill came from the House it provided:

Fighting and preventing forest fires: For fighting and preventing forest fires, $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, but not to exceed $150,000 of this fund shall be expended except in cases of extraordinary emergency.

That has been added to by an amendment of the Senate committee. I desire to commend the course of the committee in that regard, and I think their action will be sustained by the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to say to the Senator from Oregon that the amendment to which he refers was proposed by his colleague, the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], and is designed to provide $60,000 for the maintenance of an air-patrol service, in order to enable the War Department to cooperate with the Forestry Service.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understood the amendment had been suggested by my colleague, and I am glad the committee acted favorably upon it. The provision proposed to be added by the Senate committee is—

And to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with the War Department in the maintenance of an air patrol for fire prevention and suppression on the national forests of the Pacific coast and the Rocky Mountain regions, $60,000; in all, $310,000.

The problems of the war and of the period since the war have emphasized more than at any previous time the importance of forests to our industries. We have had such an abundance of available timber resources in this country that we have not appreciated the part that these have played in our everyday life. Until comparatively recently it has been possible to obtain lumber in abundance at reasonable prices.

We have, however, been drawing on our original supplies, and even to-day 85 per cent of the lumber found in the general market comes from original timber—that is, from trees from 125 to 250 or more years of age. As one timber center has been cut, the extension of transportation has enabled the opening up of new areas. Thus, we have seen the original forests of the Northeastern States exhausted, then the Central States, then the Lake States, and the center of lumber production finally transferred to the great pine forests of the Gulf States. It now comes as something of a shock to the country to learn that these supposedly inexhaustible pine forests are approaching an end. The original bodies of pine timber in the South—that is, those which are of importance for large quantity production—will be cut out within 10 to 15 years at the present rate of production. This does not mean that every tree will be cut, but that the old growth forests which support the great lumber mills will be largely cut out.

EFFECTS OF FOREST DEPLETION.

The effects of forest depletion are felt long in advance of the cutting of the last tree. The effects are felt just as soon as the production of a given region begins to fall off to a point where the timber from that region is no longer of importance as a competitive factor in the market. We are still cutting white pine in Minnesota, but that region has long ceased to be a factor in the competitive market and the stumpage has progressively risen to $12 to $16 a thousand.

Precisely this is happening in the South to-day, as the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY], who sits near me, I think, will testify. Until recently southern pine has dominated the principal markets of the country. This means chiefly the markets of the East, because the largest per cent of the consumers of lumber live east of the Rocky Mountains. Recently southern yellow pine has been rapidly yielding to the Pacific coast timbers, especially Douglas fir from Oregon and Washington, in the chief competitive fields, so that to-day in many of the central western markets Douglas fir is being used in increasing quantities and southern yellow pine is gradually being withdrawn as a competitive factor. The high price of lumber in the general market is determined not by southern yellow pine, as formerly, but by Douglas fir from the Pacific coast. That is, the purchaser of lumber to-day pays the equivalent of the value of Douglas fir plus freight from the Pacific coast.

INCREASING IMPORTANCE OF WESTERN TIMBER.

This means that for the grades of lumber which can be obtained only from the original forest the country must turn more and more to the Pacific coast. It means that the forests of the Pacific Northwest assume a national significance. They represent a great asset for the Nation which every wood-consuming industry and every purchaser of lumber has a direct interest in seeing properly husbanded, carefully utilized, and perpetuated. We may well deplore the reckless waste with which our eastern forests have been progressively used up and destroyed. The very economic consequences of this dissipation of the eastern forest resources which are now being felt so generally emphasize the absolute necessity for the Nation itself to vigorously take hold of the forestry problem.

The first step in this is to prevent further devastation of such forests as the country has left, and the place to begin is to safeguard the forest resources which are owned by the people themselves—that is, the national forests. The committee of the Senate, and I may say also the committee of the House, have shown by their action that they do not propose to be niggardly in taking steps for the protection of our forests, realizing, as they do, and as they have done for a number of years past, that our forests constitute one of the greatest elements of value to the whole Nation.

THE NATIONAL FORESTS.

The dissipation of our forest resources has resulted primarily from faulty public-land policies. We may be proud of the results of our homestead laws, based, as they were, upon the wise principle of getting the agricultural lands of our country into the hands of the small-home builder. In the early days, however, recognition was not given to the fact that there are large areas wholly unsuitable for agriculture and settlement, which serve their best purpose in the long run in the production of timber. The result was that in the early days no attention whatever was paid to the forests of the public domain. Fires were allowed to burn unchecked and millions of dollars worth of damage was done every year. Enormous timber frauds were perpetrated on the Government under which great areas of public forests wholly unsuited to agriculture passed into the hands of great timber barons.

A number of years ago the policy regarding our public forests was changed and large areas were set aside as national forests, now aggregating about 155,000,000 acres. The forestry policy of the Government, the policy that was adopted of setting aside these forest areas, was condemned and denounced as an unwise policy at the time it was inaugurated; and Members of the Senate will remember that Mr. Gifford Pinchot, who was one of the early advocates of the larger withdrawals, was denounced in many parts of this country for the policy he was urging. I assert, however, that if it had not been for that policy, which withdrew these magnificent forests from private acquisition by a few great timber barons, the forest lands of this country would have been lost to the general public and placed in the hands of a few individuals. I think, now, the people are beginning to commend the policy that was then adopted, instead of condemning those who were the authors of it.

These large areas have been under the administration of the Forest Service in the Department of Agriculture for approximately 15 years. During that time there has been built up a system of fire prevention which involves various improvements in the forests, such as trails, fire lines, lookout points, telephone communications, and so forth. It involves also an organization of men prepared to detect fires and to extinguish such as start.

Adjacent to the national forests and interlocked with them are State lands and private lands. It has been recognized that fire prevention requires a coordinated system applicable to all lands regardless of ownership. It is fruitless for one owner to employ preventive measures on his lands when his neighbor's land is unprotected and a constant menace. In the Northwestern States the Forest Service, the States, and private owners have worked out such a coordinated system of fire protection, which is effective so far as it goes.

We have not fully mastered forest fires. Although excellent work has been done by the Government and other agencies in the Northwest in their efforts to prevent fires, there is still every year a loss far beyond what the public can afford to have occur. It is not merely a question of pecuniary loss in timber, but the destruction of a usable product which requires from 75 to 150 or more years to produce. This is quite aside from the damage which is actually being done every year to the watersheds of rivers of enormous importance to irrigation and manufacturing enterprises.

It should be recalled that the forests of the Northwest are almost wholly coniferous. It should be recalled also that we have a long dry season. In some years there may be no rain at all in certain places for periods as long as 90 days. Under such conditions the soil dries out to a great depth and the surface cover becomes thoroughly desiccated. At such times there are apt to be heavy and constant winds. A small fire set by lightning, by a careless smoker, or from a locomotive spreads under these conditions very rapidly and if not quickly extinguished soon becomes a real conflagration.

Great progress has been made in recent years in educating the public to better care in the matter of fire in the woods. The danger from the negligence of campers has been greatly reduced, but a certain number of fires are inevitable every year from carelessness; and we always have the great unpreventable cause of fires—that is, lightning.

This last year, in spite of the best efforts of the Forest Service, there were 6,800 fires started in the national forests that had to be fought by the protective force. A good many of these fires were quickly discovered and extinguished before they had covered more than a few acres. Over 70 per cent of these fires were put out before they reached 10 acres. Several hundred fires, however, were in localities where they could not be discovered quickly or could not be reached quickly, and these did a very large amount of damage.

The greatest damage was in the northwestern region, where some of the most valuable timber remaining in the country is located.

The immensity of it is hard to realize; and it is for that reason that I am undertaking to place this statement in the RECORD, so that in the consideration of the protection of the forests in the future the Congress may have some of these figures before them. There was burned over altogether approximately 2,000,000 acres within the national forests, with a damage amounting to about $4,000,000. In addition, it cost the Government approximately $3,000,000 to meet the great emergency of last season. The summer of 1919 was the dryest in the Northwest of any year since 1889. The conditions were therefore unusual. We must, however, expect severe droughts from time to time, and must be prepared to prevent such disasters as occurred last year.

These losses are greater than the country can possibly afford. We must not permit millions of dollars' worth of timber, or even hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of timber, to be burned up.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I wondered whether the losses from forest fires during the last year or possibly two years were not greater because of a depleted Forest Service force, many of the men having gone to the war, for example?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That was a factor, of course; but I will say to the Senator that volunteers were ready at any time in the States, men who were not fitted for military duties, to assist in putting out these fires.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. NUGENT. May I suggest to the Senator one further reason, and that is that a very considerable number of experienced forest men left the service, because of the comparatively small salaries paid to them, and entered other fields of industry, and that it was next to impossible to build up a sufficiently efficient organization last year to cope with these fires.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator is correct about it. Not only did these young men go into the service, as suggested by the Senator from South Dakota, but the men at the head of the Forestry Service went over and did their bit in protecting the forests of France and others upon which the Allies were compelled to rely for timber to carry on the war.

Take Forester Graves, for instance, as one, and others who were immediately under him. They went over, and some of them were decorated for the splendid service they rendered the Allies in the war, so that there was, as both Senators have suggested, some reason for the losses which occurred last year.

Every stick of our timber is needed. More than that, however, these are measurable damages. The national forests are at the headwaters of our rivers and streams upon which the West depends for water for irrigation, for power, and various other purposes. Many instances can be pointed out where the destruction of forests by fire has already had a serious influence on the character and volume of the stream flow. This is well illustrated in years like 1919, when the streams dried up quickly where the slopes had been stripped of their forests, and there was a much more sustained flow where the forests had not been injured.

VALUE OF THE TIMBER.

The volume of timber standing in the national forests in the Northwest and in California aggregates something like 400,000,000,000 feet, board measure. This represents fully three-fourths of the timber which is still in the hands of the Nation. At a valuation of $1 a thousand this represents a tangible value of $400,000,000, and it is a value which is increasing each year; and I may add here that the value I have placed on it as an estimate is extremely low.

In addition to the Government timber there is an immense amount of State and private timber which should also be safeguarded as a resource available for industrial use. It has been estimated that private timber in the region in question amounts to from twelve to fifteen hundred billion feet, board measure. Every private owner has a definite responsibility to handle his lands in such a way that there will not be injury to the public. He must not be permitted to devastate his property and thereby jeopardize his neighbors and the public at large. In practice, however, the individual private owner is helpless unless there is cooperation and assistance of the public.

The character of the public forestry problem is such that the public itself must take the lead. It is absolutely necessary that the public adequately protect its property and take the leadership in the organization of a fire protective system, in which all private owners will be required to participate generously, making such contributions as are equitable and necessary. The public interest in the protection of all the forests of the country is such that it can well afford to contribute liberally, at least in the protection of its own property and in cooperating so as to bring about an efficient protective system on lands which are privately owned.

NEED OF AIR PATROL.

Forest patrol by aircraft is proposed not as a substitute for the system which is now in effect. I am calling attention to this, Mr. President, because a disposition has been shown upon the part of Congress, after billions of dollars have been expended in the development of the airplane, now to abandon it. This disposition is being shown notwithstanding the fact that Great Britain, Italy, and France are spending immense sums for the purpose of developing the airplane to its highest possible development, and for the training of aviators as well. Here is a use to which the airplane may be put in the United States which will not only encourage the development of the airplane but will lead to the training of men who shall operate airplanes in times of peace and in war. I am going to call the attention of the Senate particularly to the splendid work that was done experimentally by airplanes during the fires of last season, which were very destructive; and if it had not been for this service cooperating with the State services and with the Forest Service of the Government, nobody can tell what the losses might have been in the great forests of the Northwest.

What is sought is to supplement the present system so as to make it more effective and to enable us really to conquer the greatest menace to our forest resources. The present system of detecting fires has definite limitations which prevent a 100 per cent efficiency. Supplemental air patrol is just what is needed to overcome the difficulties of the ordinary ground-preventive system.

The experience in California and other States last summer has demonstrated a number of important facts regarding air patrol.

California was the seat, the home, of the airplane, in a measure, because there were more fields there for the use of the airplane than anywhere else; so that, taking it as a point of beginning, there were greater possibilities than in the other States.

1. A moving observer can pick up many fires which are hidden from a stationary observation point. Frequently a fire in a canyon or on the far slope of a mountain may gain considerable headway before the smoke rises high enough to be observed from the ordinary lookout point. The quick discovery of a single fire may result in enough saving to cover the entire amount asked for by the Department of Agriculture for this work.

The possibilities of the airplane were very clearly shown in the magazine sections of nearly all of the large papers the other day in a picture of an airplane flying over the crater of the sleeping volcano Lassen, in California, taken by another airplane photographing the one below. This proves that the airplane can get right to the point for anything that is needed to be seen in the forests and in the danger sections of forest fires.

2. Frequently a distant fire is discovered from a lookout point, but it is impossible to determine its character and the probable number of men needed to extinguish it with any degree of accuracy. Under such circumstances a guess is made and a crew is sent out, which may prove to be either too many or too few. If the country is an undeveloped one, it may take from one to three days to reach the fire, when it will have become a conflagration. If too many men are sent, there has been a waste of money; if too few men are sent, the fire gets out of hand and a great loss ensues. It would require but a very short time for an airplane to inspect and report upon such a fire, enabling the dispatch of men and equipment adequate to extinguish it.

3. The airplane is of great value in directing the work of fire suppression. In the case of a large fire it may take 24 hours or more to make a study of the situation to determine just where the fire fighters should be located. With an airplane this can be determined in a very short time. The same is true in watching the work as the fire fighting progresses. Costly mistakes may thus be avoided and in the long run a great saving made.

4. The moral value of the air patrol is very great. The prevention of carelessness among people who use the woods is one of the greatest needs of to-day. The air patrol is a constant advertisement of the need of care in the woods. It has also an important effect on law enforcement. The existence of such a system, with airplanes flying about, is a notice served on every law breaker in the country.

5. Incidental to the active patrol work, the aviators should be able to do a great deal of mapping, which would be of immense service, not only in the protective work but in the handling of the various other administrative problems of the forest.

COST OF THE ENTERPRISE.

The design is to make the forest patrol incidental to the training of the aviators. It is not proposed to build up a special and additional service in the Army for forest patrol. The Army will have to maintain a certain establishment anyhow, with its planes and all of the incidental expense of operation. If at the same time this establishment can render a civil as well as a military service, it is a great gain to the Government.

There are certain expenses, however, which the Army should not properly be charged with, and the War Department has asked the Forest Service to assume these expenses. They amount altogether to $60,000, and that is the amount included in this bill. These cover the expenses of employees of the Forest Service located at the different bases and subbases of the Air Service, men who constitute a sort of liaison between the Air Service and the regular patrol service of the forests. There are also expenses connected with certain improvements, as in the construction of pigeon lofts for the carrier pigeons used in sending messages and improvement of emergency landing fields. The Air Service will furnish the pigeons which will be needed, but the Forest Service will be expected to maintain them. And, finally, there will be expenses connected with the conferences, which should be held at least once a year and probably oftener, of forest officers and members of the Air Service to plan their work and to receive personal instructions in working out the various technical problems.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. Under the amendment which the Senator is discussing I notice that this Air Service is limited to the national forests of the Pacific coast and the Rocky Mountain section. If it is good for that section, why would it not be good for other sections?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is not any question about that, but this is particularly for the national forests, which hold the largest body of timber.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand, but they are all national forests, wherever located.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would be glad to have the bill amended so that the Air Service might function anywhere.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the reason why I asked the question.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The only reason why it was confined to that section was because it is the only section that seemed to be demanding it at the hands of the committee; and besides, as I have stated to the Senator and have tried to show here, practically all the timberlands which now belong to the people as a whole are located in the national forest reserves in the West.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no doubt about that, but there are some reserves in the southern country that ought to be protected.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am in accord with the Senator's views, and we will cooperate with Senators from any section of the country in having the service extended.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senator is always broad and liberal in such matters, and that is the reason why I asked him the question. I hope he will pardon me for interrupting him.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad to be interrupted, and if the Senator will draw an amendment that will assist in extending the use of this air patrol to other sections, I will promise him that I shall do all I can to get it through, because, aside from forestry protection, it will aid in the training of aviators and in preparing for war in case war ever comes.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention briefly to the history of the development of the use of the airplane in forestry protection.

HISTORY OF AIR PATROL.

Mr. C. E. Rachford, acting district forester, in a report on airplane forest-fire patrol, gives the history of the movement in California so clearly that I quote from it as follows:

> The first mention of the use of the airplane, so far as is now known, in connection with forestry fires, dates back to 1909, when a resolution adopted at a meeting of the forest supervisors held in El Paso, Tex., called attention to the possibilities of this method of fire patrol on the national forests. The first actual use of aircraft in this connection was made in Wisconsin in 1915. At that time a Curtiss four-passenger flying boat, equipped with a Curtiss eight-cylinder V-type 100-horsepower motor, owned and operated by a Mr. L. A. Vilas, made daily flights, rising from Big Trout Lake over some of the Wisconsin State forests. The ship so used had an air speed of 62 miles and a climbing capacity of 1,000 feet in three minutes. Flying at an average altitude of 1,000 feet above the terrain, the operator was enabled to get a view of about 40 miles in every direction. He returned to his original base, which was Big Trout Lake, to land and report to the State forestry officials any fires that he might detect.

Early in 1919 the Forest Service requested of the War Department that cooperation in fire protection by means of airplane fire patrol be given by the Air Service as an experimental measure and on national forests in the vicinity of regularly established aviation fields. This request was met by the War Department and Air Service personnel, both in Washington and at local fields, with an exceedingly gratifying spirit of willingness.

Organized and sustained aerial forest fire patrol was, therefore, first attempted during the season of 1919. The service was first inaugurated in California. The work was performed by the Air Service using its personnel and equipment. It was on an experimental basis, with the idea of determining the feasibility of using aircraft for this purpose by the actual establishment and operation of regular patrols rather than by means of a few test flights.

Beginning June 1 air patrol was begun from Mather Field, near Sacramento; from March Field, near Riverside; and from Rockwell Field, near San Diego. The individual routes as established and followed were as follows:

From Mather Field there were two routes, the first going via Placerville, Auburn, and Nevada City to Oroville, with a return trip in the afternoon over the same route. This covered the major portion of the Tahoe and the north end of the Eldorado National Forests. The second patrol was from Mather Field to Placerville; thence south over the Eldorado Forest to Chinese, on the Stanislaus Forest; the return being over the same route in the afternoon; and the territory covered including the south half of the Eldorado and the greater portion of the Stanislaus Forests.

From March Field two routes were established. The first covering a circle on the Angeles Forest, touching on its west the San Antonio Canyon, zigzagging eastward along the south slope of the San Bernardino Mountains to about the mouth of Mill Creek; thence returning to the base at March Field. The second route circled eastward to the south side of Mill Creek, on the Angeles Forest, swinging south over Banning, and covering the west slope of the San Jacinto Mountains and the heads of the San Jacinto River, on the Cleveland Forest, turned back to its base. These routes thus covered the Angeles and a portion of the Cleveland National Forests.

From Rockwell Field: One patrol route, covering the central portion of the Descanso district and the northeastern side of the range on the Palomar district, thus completing a patrol of the entire Cleveland Forest.

Thus, beginning July, five daily patrols covering national forest areas of exceptionally high values were in operation, and twice each day five ships covered the better part of some 6,000,000 acres of rough, mountainous, heavily timbered country. The average nonstop run was in the neighborhood of 160 miles, the average round trip some 320 miles.

The opening of the hunting season in northern California in August witnessed a critical flare-up of fires. An unusual number of fires was reported, and for various reasons several of them assumed alarming proportions. The California situation became critical, and in view of past experience and of the situation then prevailing in Idaho, Montana, Oregon, and elsewhere, additional precautionary measures became necessary. Extension of the air patrol to cover practically all the national forests in California was asked by the Forest Service and was as promptly granted by the Western Department Air Service. Two new bases, one at Red Bluff and the other at Fresno, were promptly established.

Existing air patrol routes were modified. The Curtiss planes were replaced by De Haviland 4s, and on September 1 complete patrol twice daily of 15 out of the 17 national forests in California was inaugurated. No patrol was attempted east of the Sierras on the Inyo and Mono National Forests because of the relative lack of fire risk.

From Red Bluff the first of these new routes led east and north around Mount Lassen, across Hayden Hill, to the landing field at Alturas. The afternoon run went west across the Modoc to the Shasta lava beds and the vicinity of Mount Shasta, south on the divide between the Pitt and McCloud Rivers to Round Mountain, east to the eastern edge of the Lassen, and south and west again to Red Bluff. The second patrol out of Red Bluff went west to the California Forest, north along a divide west of the Sacramento Canyon to Delta, thence west over the Sawyers Bar country, in the Klamath, over the Salmon River and Klamath River country, and back to the field at Montague. The afternoon run, which was, by the way, the longest single leg on any patrol in California, covered the country from Montague west and south over the Salmon River country, south for the full length of the Trinity National Forest on the coast side and south for the full length of the California Forest on the coast side to a landing field at Lakeport. From Lakeport the return to Red Bluff was made via the valley side of the California Forest.

The first patrol from Fresno went east into the high country, north over Huntington Lake and the Yosemite to the landing point at Chinese, which was the southern run of the second of the Mather Field patrols. The return trip was made over the same route in the afternoon. The second Fresno patrol went east over the high country, south across the Sequoia Park and the Sequoia Forest to Bakersfield. The return trip was made again over the same route in the afternoon.

On or about September 1 the daily sustained airplane patrol was being given to 15 of the 17 national forests in district 5, and in addition to the service rendered by regular forest patrols, aviators on cross-country flights, and student and other balloon observers at Arcadia were under instructions to report promptly to the proper authorities any and all fires which they might discover.

In addition to these regular patrols by airplane, the Balloon School at Arcadia stationed a balloon at an elevation of about 3,000 feet where a view was had of the country on the south slope of the San Gabriel watershed between San Dimas and La Canada. This watershed was chosen because of its extreme importance to the citrus and other agricultural interests in the general vicinity of Los Angeles.

EQUIPMENT, PERSONNEL, LANDING FIELDS, ETC.

Beginning June 1 the Curtiss or JN–4–D plane was used on the patrols out of Mather Field. These planes were not equipped with wireless or with any special means of communication. It was, therefore, impossible to report fires discovered until after the planes had landed, either at the home field or at the landing field, at the end of the run. From March and Rockwell Fields the JN–4–H planes were used. These ships were equipped with wireless telegraph. Beginning, approximately, September 1 the De Haviland 4 was substituted throughout the State for the other two types mentioned. No wireless equipment was available on the De Havilands and reporting was done entirely after landing. The De Haviland plane proved apparently more satisfactory than the earlier type used because it could more easily negotiate the altitudes it was necessary to make in the central Sierra and northern California regions, and because, both on account of its speed and its larger gas capacity, it could cover more territory in a given length of time than could the Curtiss planes.

As a matter of fact, Air Service equipment and personnel was used throughout, except that the Forest Service furnished guards for the planes at temporary bases, such as Red Bluff and Fresno, and at landing fields outside of established bases, as at Chinese, Oroville, Alturas, and so forth, except, also, that local transportation at the bases and landing fields was furnished by the Forest Service or by the communities interested in securing the location of the fields.

Observation was accomplished by Air Service personnel, except, as quite often happened, forest officers took flights either for the experience, to get first-hand information as to the possibilities of airplane patrol, or on special occasions to get first-hand definite information about the fire situation in general or about conditions on some individual fire.

Wireless equipment was used somewhat from the two southern fields, as already mentioned. Carrier pigeons were also used to some extent in the South, as were notes attached to small parachutes and dropped from the planes.

The personnel in each plane for northern California made a practice of carrying a gun, canteen filled with water, and emergency rations for two men for seven days. Maps of various types were furnished by the Forest Service. The map most generally used by the Redding patrol was the General Land Office base map of California on a scale of 12 miles to the inch. For the patrol out of Mather Field specially prepared strip maps were used. Information for these maps was taken from the forest-recreation maps, from the General Land Office maps, and from other sources, and the maps were put in such shape that they might be used in connection with the regular roll-holder attachment. On the patrols in southern California, sheets 1, 2, and 3. This is issued on a scale of 1 to 250,000. It was ruled off into squares of 2 miles each, the abscissa being numbered and the ordinate lettered, so that a given fire would be reported as in block 24 T, for example. For the sake of durability, all maps were mounted on cloth, and for convenience in use in flying they were first cut to fold to a size suitable to fit the pockets of a flying suit, not greater than 6 by 8. All lettering and numbering was, for convenience, extended so as to appear on each fold of the sheet.

The landing fields at the end of each patrol were provided in each case by the city or town authorities. To be satisfactory such landing fields had to be level or with a constant grade not over 3 per cent, smooth enough that a Ford could run over them at 25 miles an hour, 2,000 feet long and from 600 to 800 feet wide, free from obstructions, such as telephone poles, wires, trees, and so forth. Facilities for gas, oil, and water were provided locally for each field, as was telephone communication with field. Meals while away from headquarters were provided by the State forester, and at the Red Bluff base a Forest Service man was designated as liaison officer and was stationed continuously at the base. Instructions were issued providing that all emergency landings were to be reported immediately by the regular lookouts, and necessary arrangements were made to succor and transport the pilot, guard the plane, and guide and assist the wrecking crew. Prompt transmission of the pilots' reports was provided for, as was also, toward the latter part of the season, a daily return report, so that all pilots might check their fire locations with the actual locations as determined on the ground. Emergency landing fields were very seldom used, for the ships seemed apparently to be in excellent condition throughout the summer, and very little serious trouble was encountered. That ranches and natural openings, such as meadows in the high country, were used on occasion is demonstrated by the experience fairly early in the season of one of the patrols operating out of Mather Field on the run to Chinese Flat. The pilot in this case had covered about two-thirds of his run when suddenly the entire right bank of his motor stopped like a shot. The pilot, from an altitude of 7,000 feet, picked a small opening as an emergency landing place and dropped some 5,000 feet into a strange field hardly bigger than a dinner plate. The landing was made without a scratch to himself and with only minor casualties to the plane, although in order to make a "safe" landing it was necessary to pivot on one wing, tearing it somewhat, and at the same time dishing the wheel.

ACTUAL ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF AIRPLANE PATROL.

The outstanding feature of airplane patrol in California during 1919 was the fact that with no previous planning daily and practically uninterrupted service was continued from June 1, the date originally set, until October 31, the end of the fire season. In fact the patrol was so regular that the press of California, in commenting upon it, carried a story to the effect that miners and ranchers living back in the mountains actually set their watches each morning as the patrol went by.

For the period June 1 to August 30 five patrols—all that had been asked for—covered twice each day an acreage of some 5,035,142 acres of land within five national forests, and in addition an unestimated acreage of private lands outside the forests was also covered. The Government timber patroled during this period is estimated at 20,219,565,000 feet, board measure, worth some $40,439,130. In accomplishing this work a total of approximately 745 flights actually covered 92,605 miles. There were discovered, located, and reported a total of 118 fires, 23 of them being both discovered and reported in advance of the regular Forest Service detection organization, which was, since the airplane was experimental only, still on the job.

Beginning September 1 airplane patrol was extended to cover 15 out of the 17 national forests in the State. From September 1 to October 31 daily airplane patrol covered then some 21,484,368 acres of land within the national forests, on which was growing 105,112,460,000 feet of Government timber, worth some $210,224,920. In addition to the figures given above, a very appreciable acreage of private timberlands outside the national forests was covered by the patrol, and it is entirely probable that the figures for stumpage and for the value of that stumpage might appropriately be doubled if the total amount and value of all timber covered by airplane patrol in California were sought.

The total number of flights, number of miles covered, fires discovered, and so forth, for the entire season—June 1 to October 31—is, according to data received, as follows:

Field.	Number flights.	Number miles.	Total number fires discovered.	Number fires discovered first.
Mather		47,658	155
March		68,549	147
Rockwell		36,854	24
Red Bluff		29,239	107
Fresno		19,709	9
Total		202,009	442	27

Further consideration of actual accomplishments is discussed under the heads of prevention, detection, location, report, and suppression.

Prevention: There is but one source of unpreventable fires—lightning. All others are caused through some human agency and might, therefore, be prevented had the general public been properly educated and had the necessary preventive measures been taken by Federal, State, and private interests. It follows, then, that to give the necessary publicity to the fire question is a matter of extreme importance. It is hard to overestimate the value of the airplane as an educational factor in fire prevention. It is an object which naturally lends itself to publicity in the daily press.

CONTINUATION OF AIR PATROL.

Experimental airplane forest-fire patrol in Oregon and California has proven a success, notwithstanding the fact that the work was undertaken without previous experience, either by the aviators or by the Forestry Service, with limited equipment and personnel, and without any opportunity of preparation on the part of the Air Service, and without preparation, proper planes, funds, knowledge of airplanes, limitations, and possibilities by the Forestry Service. It has proven such a success that an airplane forest-fire project covering the national forests of the Western States has been proposed by the Air Service to the Secretary of War through the Chief of Staff. The project contemplates the organization of five airplane squadrons by the Air Service, to be known as forest-patrol squadrons, each of these squadrons to have a personnel of 32 officers and 132 enlisted men and 19 airplanes. Under the proposed project the squadrons will be stationed during the forest-fire season at appropriate and feasible places in California, Oregon, Washington, and Montana, with subbases, amongst other places, at Eugene, Medford, and La Grande in Oregon; at Spokane and Camp Lewis in Washington; at Boise in Idaho; at Cody in Wyoming; at Helena and Missoula in Montana.

The Forest Service, acting in cooperation with private owners of timber, will, of course, contribute to the work of providing necessary maps for use on patrol, ground for bases, subbases, emergency landings, telephone communication between bases and subbases, and protection agencies, the necessary personnel for receiving and dispatching reports at bases, subbases, and landings, lofts for pigeons and for the training of the birds, instructions to its personnel by attendance at a course to be conducted by Air Service officials at such places as may be designated, in order to qualify them for their duties under the cooperative plan.

The patrol will cover, more or less extensively, the Federal, State, and private timber in the States of Washington, Oregon, California, Idaho, Montana, and northwest Wyoming, and it is estimated that the timber in these States amounts to approximately 1,524,000,000 feet board measure, which is worth, at a most conservative valuation, not less than $1 a thousand feet. It is divided between the States as follows: Oregon, 547,000,000; Washington, 395,000,000; Idaho, 130,000,000; Montana, 68,000,000; Wyoming, 2,000,000; California, 382,000,000.

The several States in which are situated these forest reserves, as well as individual owners of timberlands, realizing the great value of this timber, have been cheerfully cooperating with the Forestry Service, and will the more cheerfully continue this cooperation because they realize the great possibilities of protection against forest fires by the use of airplane patrol.

The national forests in Oregon patroled by the airplane patrol in 1919 were:

Area and valuation of national forests in Oregon.

Name.	Area.	Value.
	Acres.
Cascade	1,091,485
Crater	1,079,325
Oregon	1,140,866
Santiam	719,983
Siskiyou	1,255,250
Siuslaw	833,441
Umpqua	1,221,391
Total	7,344,741	[1] $79,431,250

TRAINING OF AVIATORS.

The World War demonstrated that the airplane was absolutely essential to success in modern warfare. It was the eye of the Army, observing the movements of troops, photographing the terrain over which battles were to be fought, and directing the fire of the artillery. The Allies and the Central Powers vied with each other in the development and the improvement of the different classes of airplanes necessary for military use, and, realizing the necessity of further development, the British, French, Italian, and other Governments are appropriating large sums of money to continue the aviation service, to develop higher types of planes, and to train aviators. The United States alone has seemed reluctant to continue this work in time of peace, failing to profit by the expensive lessons of the war, which found us wholly unprepared in airplane development and production; nor did the expenditure of over a billion dollars enable us to place more than a few hundred planes on the battle front before the armistice was signed.

Here, however, is a practical use to which the Air Service may be put, the airplane developed, and aviators trained, so that in the event of war we will not only have the highest type of machines but the highest class of trained men to operate them.

Mr. President, this is all I have to say. I simply wanted to call the attention of Congress to the actual work done by the air fire patrol and the immense saving made to the country by reason of the participation of the fire patrol with the Forestry Service, in cooperation, of course, with the States and with private owners. I hope that as this bill comes up for consideration each year Congress will realize more fully the importance of the national forests to our industrial life and that larger appropriations, if necessary, will be made in order that the national forests may be absolutely and fully protected for all time to come.

Mr. GAY. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill. I ask to have it lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That action will be taken. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 35, line 2, under "Forestry Service," it is proposed to strike out "nine" and insert "twenty-nine," so as to read:

Twenty-nine clerks, at $1,500 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, in connection with the pending bill, being a great supply bill to aid agriculture, I do not think there is any more important question to the agricultural interests of the country than an adequate supply of nitrogen. There is a most important bill now pending before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry seeking to vitalize the war expenditures of the Government for the collection of nitrogen so that it may be used for agricultural purposes.

There has been published in some of the hearings a letter that I would like to have appear in the RECORD. It is a letter from the Secretary of War to the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] in reference to that bill, and inclosing a letter from Mr. Arthur Glasgow, who had charge, to a large extent, of the development of these nitrate plants. Instead of taking the time of the Senate now to read those letters into the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent that they may be printed in connection with my remarks.

The letters are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, October 29, 1919.

Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Jr.,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR WADSWORTH: I inclose a proposed bill providing a method of conducting operations at the United States plant No. 2, at Muscle Shoals, Ala., authorizing the expenditure of such additional sums as are necessary to equip the plant to turn out fixed nitrogen in available form for agricultural uses. I shall be grateful if you will introduce the bill into the Senate, where a discussion can be had upon it from both points of view, namely, first, the importance of maintaining this great enterprise as a military asset for the production of nitrogen for explosives, independently of importations; and, second, the contribution which can be made to the farmers of the country by increasing the available supply of nitrogen for fertilizer.

The investment of the Government in this great plant approximates $70,000,000. In addition to that, under authority already granted by the Congress and by direction of the President, a dam is being constructed at Muscle Shoals which will incidentally improve navigation of the Tennessee River, but the primary purpose of which is the development of an immense water power to be used in connection with the fixation of nitrogen, should the electrical process remain the most economical for that purpose. This investment can only be salvaged by continuing the operation of the enterprise and by improving the processes, with a view to further economies and consequent reduction in price for available nitrogen for agricultural purposes. If we allow the plant to stand idle it will not only deteriorate, but will become obsolescent, while if it can be continued in operation the forward steps in the development of the process can be currently installed, and, should any emergency need arise, the plant will be up to date and ready for immediate use. Because this property now belongs to the War Department it seems wise that legislation affecting it should be introduced by the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee; but the major usefulness of the plant—practically its entire usefulness—in peace times will be to the agricultural interests of the Nation, and it is my hope that from both points of view the suggestion can receive sympathetic study.

It will be observed that the bill proposes operation by a corporation in which the Government will be the sole stockholder, rather than through one of the established bureaus of the War Department. The choice of such an instrument is dictated by the greater freedom with which the commercial and scientific undertakings of the plant can be carried on under such circumstances, and the operation of the Panama Canal Railroad is appealed to as illustrating the advantage of that form of operation in a somewhat analogous, though it seems to me more persuasive, instance.

When the bill has been introduced and referred, it will give me great pleasure to lay all the details of the present situation and such accurate forecasts as our engineers have been able to make before the committee for their consideration. The department believes that it will be possible with the outlay suggested in the bill to produce on a commercial basis recognized chemical products of high value and ready sale, even prior to the completion of the dam and the installation of hydroelectric power. When that end of the project is completed an even more favorable result will be obtained, and the value of the plant, particularly to the farmers, will be great and constantly growing.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

BRIGHTON HOTEL,
Washington, D. C., October 22, 1919.

The SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: 1. With the return of our Military and Agricultural Commissions from Europe, our investigations have at last reached conclusions which can now be interpreted into definite recommendations regarding the disposition of United States Nitrate Plant No. 2, at Muscle Shoals.

A convincing feature of these recommendations is that each and every line of investigation, however distinct and whatever the predisposition of investigators, has led invariably to the same conclusions.

2. The war has demonstrated beyond dispute that no nation is safe which is dependent upon a foreign supply of nitrogen. National security demands an adequate domestic supply of high explosives, the consumption of which in modern warfare has been found vastly to surpass all expectations. The cause of the Allies was in constant jeopardy, because of the necessity of importing nitrates from Chile; it does not need Lord Fisher's recent articles, regarding the future of submarine warfare, to demonstrate the uncertainty of importing military supplies. But, while the fundamental requirement of national defense demands self-sufficiency in explosives, this necessity places the United States in a position of some comparative advantages, because only nations able to provide an adequate supply of fixed nitrogen can wage successful war against the United States.

The capture of atmospheric nitrogen, in efficiently utilizable form, now completing, are brought into continuously developing service, they and their products are likely to be obsolescent and useless in the strenuous competition of future warfare. The only way to secure that these plants shall be always immediately available for most efficient military service, and for most efficient economical extension in case of need, is to operate them continuously, whether in peace or war. Fortunately, from this point of view, nitrogen is as essential in peace as in war. It is necessary to preserve life as to destroy life; and is the most expensive component of standard fertilizers.

3. The following discussion describes how we propose to maintain and continuously enhance the military value of United States Nitrate Plant No. 2 at Muscle Shoals, while substituting its peace-time output for imported nitrogen compounds on terms highly beneficial to American agriculture. This will be accomplished, not only without additional cost to the United States, but while earning interest on about one-half of the total war cost of this plant and accessories.

4. The proper utilization of the smaller United States nitrate plant (No. 1) at Sheffield has not yet been determined.

5. The consideration of the Muscle Shoals plant covers three progressive stages:

First. The period prior to June 1, 1921: During this period we have to pay an operating fee to the Air Nitrates Corporation equivalent to $5 per short ton of ammonium nitrate produced (say $2.48 per ton of dry cyanamid) and, in addition, a royalty of $2.53 to the American Cyanamid Co., and a royalty of 57 cents to the Air Reduction Co. per ton of dry cyanamid produced.

Second. The period from June 1, 1921, until the completion of the hydroelectric-power development: During this interim the operating fee is no longer payable, and the royalty payable to the American Cyanamid Co. (nominally about $6.33 per ton of dry cyanamid, or 26 per cent more than the combined operating fee and royalty previously payable) is subject to arbitration. Inasmuch, however, as royalty is measured by superearning power, it seems certain that little if any royalty would be assessed for the use of a process which does not pay Government bond interest upon the reproduction value of the essential plant required.

Third. The continuing period of cheap water power subsequent to the completion of the hydroelectric development: During this future period we shall have not only the relief from royalty due to arbitration but the more positive relief due to the expiration of patents. It is to be noted that the Air Reduction Co.'s royalty of 57 cents per ton of dry cyanamid is payable until January 13, 1931.

6. You are so thoroughly acquainted with the problem under discussion that I need not trouble you with the detailed evidence and reasoning upon which we base the following statements, leading to our final recommendations:

7. Inasmuch as there is no considerable present market for the nitrogen products of the Muscle Shoals plant as it now stands—namely, for cyanamid and ammonium nitrate—it is essential to adapt the plant to the manufacture of a product which is immediately saleable in large quantities, in order to carry the burden of slowly building up a demand for these less saleable products; otherwise the operating and overhead expenses of this great plant will swamp the enterprises financially before markets can be developed for these products. To this end the manufacture of sulphate of ammonia is the most efficient means; and in the Tennessee Copper & Chemical Corporation we have a neighbor who is urgently in need of purchasers of large quantities of sulphuric acid, not to speak of sulphuric-acid manufacture on our own account. We therefore recommend the installation of a neutralizing plant for the manufacture of 110,000 tons of sulphate of ammonia per annum, being one-half of the total capacity of the plant, together with coordinate storage and other facilities, at a total structural cost for this sulphate department of about $1,500,000. This is included in paragraph 18, dealing with new construction for peace-time operation.

8. It is convenient to reckon the capacity of the Muscle Shoals plant by the number of carbide furnaces in use. There are 12 furnaces altogether, each capable of producing carbide for 22,225 tons of dry cyanamid per annum. At full capacity of plant, 10 of these furnaces are working, two being always in reserve for repairs, etc. The local steam power plant at present capacity will operate eight of these furnaces, and, inasmuch as power brought from the Government's unit at the Warrior River station of the Alabama Power Co. is unduly expensive, it is not intended to operate more than eight furnaces (or 80 per cent of the total capacity of the plant), until the cheap hydroelectric power is available.

9. Our present expectation is to utilize the capacity of eight carbide furnaces approximately as follows:

Four furnaces (or 40 per cent of plant capacity) for the manufacture of 86,000 tons of ammonium sulphate;

One furnace (or 10 per cent of plant capacity) for the manufacture of 22,225 tons of dry cyanamid—making 24,445 tons of hydrated and oiled cyanamid;

Two furnaces (or 20 per cent of plant capacity) for the manufacture of 22,000 tons of ammonium nitrate;

One furnace (or 10 per cent of plant capacity) for the manufacture of cyanamid, ammonium sulphate, ammonium nitrate, or intermediate product, according to demand.

When the hydroelectric power is completed the remaining two furnaces will be applied to the manufacture of the then most advantageous product, possibly ammonium phosphate.

Meanwhile every effort will be made to cultivate the use—firstly, of cyanamid, and secondly, of ammonium nitrate, in preference to ammonium sulphate, because the cost per unit of nitrogen is much less in those forms than in the form of ammonium sulphate.

10. To ascertain the financial results of the general plan of operation outlined above we must figure in terms or ammonium sulphate, that being a readily salable commodity of well standardized value. The prewar price of ammonium sulphate was about $60 per ton; it is our best judgment that the post-war prices will average over $70 per ton. Sulphate of ammonia contains about 20.6 per cent and dry cyanamid about 21.1 per cent of nitrogen, whereas ammonium nitrate contains nearly 35 per cent, or more than double the nitrogen content of sodium nitrate from Chile. Moreover, cyanamid contains over 60 per cent of lime, which is a valuable fertilizer in many soils. On the basis of nitrogen content alone, with sulphate of ammonia selling at $70 per ton, hydrated and oiled cyanamid (containing 19.2 per cent of nitrogen) would be worth $65 and ammonium nitrate would be worth $117.50.

11. Unfortunately the toxic features of cyanamid combined with its other disabilities and the hydroscopic qualities of ammonium nitrate interfere with their use for fertilization, as fertilizers as now manufactured and applied. It is therefore necessary to give the farmers and fertilizer manufacturers a sufficient reduction in price to induce them to take the trouble to overcome these disabilities. In view of the fact that within three years we expect to have available hydroelectric power for the full capacity of the plant at an operating and maintenance cost (excluding interest on investment of 0.75 mill, instead of the present steam-power cost of 4 mills per kilowatt hour, we recommend the initial sale of cyanamid at $45 and of ammonium nitrate at $100, compared with sulphate of ammonia at $70 per ton. At this scale of prices a unit of nitrogen in the form of ammonium sulphate would cost 45 per cent more than in the form of cyanamid, or 17½ per cent more than in the form of ammonium nitrate.

12. In other words, we should say to the farmer and to the fertilizer industry:

"We can not sell you ammonium sulphate at less than the market rate, governed by the law of supply and demand; but, if you are willing to take the trouble to use your nitrogen fertilizer in the form of cyanamid or ammonium nitrate, we can make you imediately the very great savings described above. We, for our part, undertake to remove the physiological disadvantages of cyanamid by hydrating and olling, and to relieve the hygroscopicity of ammonium nitrate by coating; and we expect to make further reductions in the prices of cyanamid and nitrate when cheap water power becomes available."

13. Having established the probable selling prices, we must now know the probable costs of the several products, in the three periods described in the beginning of this discussion.

Prior to June 1, 1921, if operating continuously eight of the carbide furnaces (or 80 per cent of the ultimate capacity of the plant), the costs per ton would be as follows:

	Cyanamid (hydrated and oiled).	Nitrate.	Sulphate.
Production costs	$29.02	$80.48	$49.45
Bagging expense	1.75	2.00	.50
Sales expense	1.15	3.08	1.87
Research and Washington office	.95	2.55	1.54
Cost of product	32.87	88.11	53.36
To these must be added royalties and fees to June 1, 1921, as follows:
Royalty to Air Reduction Co	.52	1.16	.59
Royalty to American Cyanamid Co	2.30	5.11	2.62
Operating fee to Air Nitrates Corporation	2.25	5.00	2.55
Total steam-power costs prior to June 1, 1921	37.94	99.38	59.13

14. For the middle period, from June 1, 1921, until water power is available (say, until December, 1922, or 18 months), we may add 10 per cent to "Cost of product" for the first period, in substitution for operating fee royalties and contingencies, making:

Total costs from June 1, 1921, until water power is available:

Cyanamid	$36.16
Sulphate	58.70

15. When water power becomes available at 0.75 mill per kilowat hour, and with all royalties eliminated, the respective water-power costs will be:

Cyanamid	$24.57
Sulphate	43.81

The royalty payable to Air Reduction Co. until 1931 is:

Cyanamid	$0.52

The nominal royalty to American Cyanamid Co. after June 1, 1921, is:

Sulphate	6.18

But this is subject to arbitration (see par. 5) and to the lapse of patent rights.

It is believed that 10 per cent added to the above "water-power costs," to cover all contingencies, including royalties, will provide a proper margin of safety. This makes the inclusive water-power costs:

Cyanamid	$27.03
Sulphate	48.19

16. It must be borne in mind that the estimates of cost for the first two periods, ending when water power becomes available (say, December, 1922), are based upon the continuous operation of eight carbide furnaces, or 80 per cent of the ultimate capacity of the plant. It is obvious that a new industry of these huge dimensions will not thus spring into being; the creation of this unique manufacturing organization and the marketing of this great output must be matters of careful and gradual growth. In fact, this growth will doubtless continue until the water power becomes available, before reaching the full 80 per cent capacity of the present steam-power plant. For this reason the figures for the steam-power costs in the first and second periods are academic rather than practical; they are useful as illustrating the great advantages attaching to cheap water power, rather than as a measure of profit and loss during the initiation of the business. In common with the creation of any new industry, the Muscle Shoals enterprise must sustain initial losses. These are provided for by the "General purposes fund," described in paragraph 20.

17. For any useful conclusion regarding the future financial possibilities of the plant, we must look to the permanent water-power costs, subsequent to, say, January 1, 1923.

Taking the "Inclusive water-power costs," given in paragraph 14 above, and reducing the selling prices of cyanamid, ammonium sulphate, and ammonium nitrate, respectively, to $40, $65, and $90 per ton, we have the following balance sheet, with eight furnaces, or 80 per cent of the capacity of the plant, in operation:

	Tons per annum.	Cost.	Per ton sale.	Profit.	Total profit.
Cyanamid	49,000	$27.00	$37.50	$10.50	$514,500.00
Nitrate	22,000	75.35	90.00	14.65	322,300.00
Annual profit for 8 furnaces (80 per cent)					2,281,600.00

When the whole plant is in operation the balance sheet becomes:

	Tons per annum.	Cost.	Per ton sale.	Profit.	Total profit.
Cyanamid	73,500	$27.00	$37.50	$10.50	$771,750.00
Nitrate	22,000	75.35	90.00	14.65	322,300.00
Sulphate	107,500	48.20	65.00	116.80	1,806,000.00

This $2,900,050 is 5 per cent interest on $58,000,000, while ammonium sulphate, at $65 per ton (instead of $70), still costs 61½ per cent more per unit of nitrogen than cyanamid, at $37.50 per ton, and 21½ per cent more than ammonium nitrate, at $90 per ton.

18. To adapt the present plant (which is built exclusively for the production of ammonium nitrate for military explosives) to the manufacture and sale of cyanamid, ammonium sulphate, ammonium nitrate, and intermediate products will require the following new construction and equipment, in addition to some $1,000,000 which must yet be expended for military purposes out of present funds:

Oiling and hydrating equipment for 200 tons of cyanamid daily	$150,000
Sulphate of ammonia plant, buildings, and equipment, capacity 300 tons daily	900,000
Storage and bagging for all products, buildings, and equipment	450,000
Acid storage, capacity 20,000 tons	300,000
Tank cars, shipping containers, sidings, and miscellaneous	400,000
Stores (merchandising) for employees	100,000
Office building	100,000
Reserve for extensions and betterments	600,000
Total fund for new construction	3,000,000

19. The working capital required for 10 furnaces, or full capacity of plant, will be:

Stocks of raw materials and supplies	$1,600,000
Stocks of manufactured products	2,500,000
Excess of bills receivable over bills payable	2,000,000
Total working capital	6,600,000

20. A "general purposes fund" will be required to provide (a) for the payment prior to June 1, 1921, of operating fee and royalty and (b) for the expense of creating the organization and the business starting at nil. Both (a) and (b) are to be charged to "Good will," which will be carried as an asset account until it is extinguished by profits. The money will thus be restored to "general purposes fund," to be used for improvements and betterments and in emergencies, in view of the fact that we shall not have the usual right of corporations to borrow money in case of need.

This general purposes fund should be $2,500,000.

21. To summarize, we recommend the promotion of a bill in Congress for—

New construction	$3,000,000
Working capital	6,600,000
General purposes fund	2,500,000
Total appropriation	12,100,000

This will realize the utmost peace-time advantages of the war investment of $70,000,000 in United States nitrate plant No. 2 and of the current investment of $18,000,000 in hydroelectric and navigation development, while at the same time it will promote national security by making this plant always the most advanced example of the art—supplying current military requirements and a model for efficient multiplication in case of need.

22. In addition to granting the necessary funds, namely, $12,100,000, as above, our act of Congress should give us authority to conduct these extraordinary operations so as to utilize the existing plants and this new money with the highest possible efficiency. In other words, we should have authority to establish the administrative organization which will give the best results in such an enterprise. My original memorandum of January 7, 1919, dealing with this subject, expressed the unanimous opinion of all concerned that such an undertaking could not be properly administered by the Army; and my original recommendation was that the fixed-nitrogen administration should be a self-contained bureau of the War Department, under the immediate control of the Secretary of War, but quite independent of the Army. This recommendation was then expanded to include interdepartmental control. But we now revert to my original advice, with the important exception that the fixed-nitrogen administration should be incorporated instead of being a bureau of the War Department.

23. In other words, we recommend that a corporattion should be formed to take over all of the fixed-nitrogen assets of the War Department, together with the funds obtained from Congress, and to perform all of the duties of administering these plants and funds in peace time, while continually enhancing their military value. There could be a nominal amount of common stock, of no par value, issued to the United States and held by the Secretary of War, in exchange for the fixed-nitrogen assets of the War Department, and 5 per cent preferred stock could be sold to the United States at par, from time to time as required, to provide the necessary additional funds of $12,100,000 described in paragraph 21 above. The Secretary of War would be chairman of the board; Mr. Roberts and Col. Burns might be president and vice president, respectively, as well as directors; the Chief of Ordnance might be another director. I should be willing to serve, if you wish, as director (in Europe); and an additional vice president and directors could be appointed as the organization develops and important members materialize. All of the officers and directors would, of course, be appointed and removable by the Secretary of War.

This plan would preserve to the Secretary of War his complete control of the undertaking while giving the responsible officials of this independent agency full executive and administrative freedom in the pursuit of efficiency.

24. I have sought advice in numerous quarters, and all of it strongly supports this conclusion in favor of incorporation. To check this conclusion, I have endeavored to sketch a suppositious order of the Secretary of War establishing the fixed-nitrogen administration as a departmental bureau to give effect to the anticipated congressional appropriations. I attach this draft, marked "Exhibit A," but I find myself quite incapable of producing any instrument which is a fit substitute for the accumulated experience of all past corporation management as now reflected in corporation procedure. Briefly, it seems to me there is nothing to lose and everything to gain by the process of incorporation.

25. I have therefore retained Milton Elliott, counsel for the Federal Reserve Board since its inception until last spring, to draft the proposed bill, which is presented herewith to your consideration, and I venture to ask you to make time for an immediate discussion of the points involved. I have to be urgent, because I am sailing for London November 1. With high respect,

Yours, most sincerely, ARTHUR GLASGOW.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In addition to that, to show the vital importance of early action on this question, I desire to call to the attention of the Senate a statement by Mr. Frank I. Mann, of Gilman, Ill., a farmer of great ability and learning, which is contained in a letter he wrote to his brother, Hon. JAMES R. MANN, of Illinois. It is not long, and I will therefore ask that the Secretary read that portion of the letter which I have marked.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Ever since I learned of the Muscle Shoals project, when in Tennessee a few years ago, I have felt quite an interest in its success, because of the great opportunity it seemed to present for an increased and economical production of crops by supplying a cheaper form of fixed nitrogen. The value of nitrogen and phosphorus in the production of crops has not been properly realized. Take an example of corn, for instance: In 100 pounds of corn there are but about 3½ pounds of materials which were taken from the soil; the balance of the dry weight is made of compounds formed from carbon taken from the air by the leaves of the plants and formed into sugars, starches, oils, etc. The amount of these carbon compounds that can be formed are measured, however, by the amount of materials that could be secured from the soil. If the same plants, which produced 100 pounds of corn, could have secured another 3½ pounds of soil materials—mostly phosphorus and nitrogen—they could have formed another 100 pounds of corn, without any further effort on the part of the grower, and the yield would be increased 100 per cent. On the best corn-belt soils we find it is comparatively easy to double the yields of crops by doubling the phosphorus available to the crops, where there is sufficient nitrogen to match such an amount of phosphorus. The soils which contain such an amount of nitrogen, however, are small in area. On the early glaciated and the unglaciated soils nitrogen is in small amount, and the crops will grow in proportion as they can secure nitrogen, except on the natural rich soils, which are usually alluvial and limited in extent. As a rule, the soils south of the Ohio and Missouri Rivers are unglaciated and low in nitrogen, except the alluvial types. A large part of southern Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Kansas, Iowa, and Ohio is composed of soil types on which crops—other than legumes—will grow in proportion as the plants can secure nitrogen from the soil.

This increase in yield, which comes from the proper element of fertility, increases food production without an increase in area or of man labor, and is real economic production if the cost of the fertilizing element is small.

A good deal of the corn-belt soils have already or will soon reach a nitrogen limit to their production, and, while we will be able to profitably maintain a nitrogen supply for some time by using legume crops for the purpose, it might also be profitable and economical to supplement this legume nitrogen with a fixed commercial nitrogen. In the South, however, with the high average temperature and rainfall, it is doubtful if it would be possible to maintain enough legume nitrogen in a soil to secure a high production of food products, because of the great destruction of the organic matter in which such nitrogen must be held from the bacterial action and leaching when crops are not taking food from the soil.

I know of no one thing which could add so much to the production of more and cheaper food, and in such an economical way, as to supply cheap nitrogen for these lands so poor in humus. I do not know how cheaply nitrogen might be fixed at Muscle Shoals, but it would certainly be much cheaper than to secure it through legume growth. I figured out once the relative horsepower equivalent at Niagara Falls in fixing nitrogen compared to a clover field. The nitrogen fixed by an 80-acre field of clover, under favorable conditions and a large growth, could be fixed by a 28-horsepower engine working throughout the season. If the Tennessee River can be properly harnessed, it should be able to fix nitrogen at a small fraction of the cost of fixing it by means of bacterial or legume energy.

In these days of low man power on the farms and the need of more food economically produced, it would seem to be almost a crime against civilization to not heed this great need for cheap nitrogen.

If there is any possible and fair way to provide that the Muscle Shoals power might be used for fixing nitrogen, and that it might be obtained cheaply for farm use, it would be a wonderful step in the production of cheaper food and help to quiet the unrest of the present and future.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I think Mr. Mann in that letter puts his finger on the vital problem that is now confronting the American people, and that is the high cost of living. The way to decrease the high cost of living, which in the end comes largely from the cost of products of the farm, is to enable the farmer to produce more with less labor. There is only one way to accomplish that, and that is by an adequate supply of cheap fertilizer, and an adequate supply of cheap fertilizer is absolutely dependent upon a supply of nitrogen.

During the war the Government, at a cost of $72,000,000, built a great plant for war purposes in order that it might make powder at cost. It is finished; it is prepared to run. It merely needs legislation to carry it from the field of war to the field of agriculture, to enable it to be used in the interest of manufacturing nitrogen and in the manufacture of fertilizer to supply the farmer with the means that he must have to reduce the high cost of living.

I do not say this in any way critical of the Senate or of the committee having charge of these matters, but I feel that it is of great importance to the country, and I think now is the proper time to call it to the attention of the Senate and the country with the hope that we may expect at a very early day a favorable report from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the bill and its early passage by the Senate.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, in the items for the Forest Service, on page 35, line 6, before the word "clerks," to strike out "one hundred and twenty-two" and insert in lieu thereof "sixty-two," so as to make the line read:

Sixty-two clerks, at $900 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 16, in the total, to strike out "$2,488,180" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,487,980," so as to read "In all, $2,487,980."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 5, after the word "erected," to insert "or improved," so as to read:

General expenses, Forest Service: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to experiment and to make and continue investigations and report on forestry, national forests, forest fires, and lumbering, but no part of this appropriation shall be used for any experiment or test made outside the jurisdiction of the United States; to advise the owners of woodlands as to the proper care of the same; to investigate and test American timber and timber trees and their uses, and methods for the preservative treatment of timber; to seek, through investigations and the planting of native and foreign species, suitable trees for the treeless regions; to erect necessary buildings: Provided, That the cost of any building erected or improved shall not exceed $1,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator think this limitation on buildings erected not to exceed $1,000 ought also to apply to any improvements that may be made upon the buildings?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that it is not the intention to use as much as $1,000 to complete any building. It was stated to the committee that there were some of the buildings which were not yet completed and for that reason the word "improved" was put in. If the Senator thinks we ought to put a further limitation upon the amount to be expended for improvements, of course I shall have no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. The wording as it is submitted would allow the Forestry Service to begin the erection of a building for $1,000. They could go as far as $1,000 would carry them in the erection of the building, and then immediately turn around and spend $1,000 for improvements. In other words, under the language suggested by the committee $1,000 would be virtually $2,000.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have the impression that the committee was informed that there was a limitation of $500 upon the cost of these buildings, as was provided in other bills. The buildings are intended for forest stations, and it has been found, under the increased cost of construction, that $500 is not actually sufficient to construct the stations. It is easy to understand that it would be a very difficult matter to build anything like a comfortable habitation for less than a thousand dollars, even though it might be built of timber, as such buildings often are. For this reason the amount was increased.

Mr. SMOOT. The amount authorized for the erection of a building is increased to a thousand dollars, and to that I have no objection; but under the words "or improved," which are here inserted, it means that on the very buildings, the erection of which has been begun on a basis of $500, there may now be expended an additional sum of $1,000, making the aggregate fifteen hundred dollars. In the case of buildings hereafter to be erected, which are supposed to be erected for a thousand dollars, as soon as they are erected, in some form or other, another thousand dollars may be expended upon them. I do not believe the Senator would desire that to happen; I will not say that it will happen; yet with the wording as it now is that is what could happen.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator from Utah will permit me, this is what the Department of Agriculture, referring to this language, stated to the committee:

The new language is desired to rectify a legal difficulty that prevents the improvement of buildings constructed under the appropriation act of previous years, in which the building limitation was less than that provided in this bill. The limitation on the cost of buildings in the national forests was formerly $500. This was later increased to $650, and this last year again it was increased. The Comptroller of the Treasury has held that a building constructed or partially constructed under either of these limitations can not be improved or completed under a higher limitation than that in effect during the fiscal year in which the construction of the building was begun. The rapidly advancing cost of materials and the increase in the wages of workmen have made it impossible to complete or to make necessary additions to some of the buildings within the existing limitations. It is important that the construction of these buildings be completed in order that they may be used in connection with the protection and administration of the national forests. The insertion of the words "or improved," as suggested, would make this possible.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is true it would make it possible. It would, however, authorize a great deal more than what the Secretary has stated as set forth in the communication just read by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. So far as I am personally concerned I have no objection to further amending the language so as to provide that the cost of a building shall not be more than a certain amount, whatever the Senator from Utah thinks it ought to be.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire the Senator to understand that I am not objecting to the expenditure of a thousand dollars on any building which is to be erected.

Mr. GRONNA. I understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. But with the wording "or improved" in the bill it means that on each of the buildings which are already erected or which have already been constructed there may be expended another thousand dollars. If the Senator from North Dakota will allow this to go over——

Mr. GRONNA. I think we can dispose of it now. I suggest that we amend it by saying that for the erection or improvement of any building the cost shall not be more than $1,000, or that no more than $1,000 shall be expended in all.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. KENDRICK. It occurs to me that there might arise a complication if that change in the language were made, from the fact that some of the stations which have been built heretofore have proven entirely inadequate and unsatisfactory. In such cases it might require as much as $1,000 to improve or rebuild those stations, and the change suggested by the chairman of the committee might interfere with that plan.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah recognizes that fact; but that is not all that this provision does. Under the original wording a building which might be started, we will say, on the 1st of July, 1920, under the authorization in this bill, could not have expended upon it more than $1,000; but if the proposed amendment is adopted they could plan immediately for the expenditure of $2,000—$1,000 for improvement and $1,000 for the erection of the building. I do not think the Senator wants that.

Mr. KENDRICK. If they were proceeding under the old law, they could not exceed the sum of $1,500 in any event.

Mr. SMOOT. That is on buildings that have already been erected.

Mr. KENDRICK. And I take it also that that would be true only in unusual cases, because, as I understand the language of the bill, it is intended to rebuild as houses for the forest rangers the stations that have been in use for some time and which are now unsatisfactory.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will yield further——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I think by a careful reading of this language it will be found that not to exceed $1,000 can be expended for any of these buildings. It reads:

That the cost of any building erected or improved shall not exceed $1,000.

That means, whether it is a newly erected building or a building that is being improved, it shall not cost to exceed $1,000. It seems to me to be perfectly plain that the cost can, in no event, exceed $1,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly in the case of a building erected under this bill the cost can not exceed $1,000; but suppose the building is already erected——

Mr. GRONNA. It does not say that the improvement shall cost not to exceed $1,000; it says that the building shall not cost more than that amount.

Mr. SMOOT. It says, "or improved shall not exceed $1,000."

Mr. GRONNA. Let me read it again:

The cost of any building—

Leave out the word "erected."

The cost of any building improved shall not exceed $1,000.

It is perfectly plain that the total cost can not exceed $1,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator to let the amendment go over for the present.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 8, after the word "forests," to strike out "$2,068,762" and insert "$2,100,262," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for the use, maintenance, improvement, protection, and general administration of the specified national forests, $2,100,262: Provided, That the foregoing amounts appropriated for such purposes shall be available interchangeably in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture for the necessary expenditures for fire protection and other unforeseen exigencies: Provided further, That the amounts so interchanged shall not exceed in the aggregate 10 per cent of all the amounts so appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have been requested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to ask to have this paragraph passed over. He is not present to-day. I refer to the paragraph beginning with line 7 and going to line 16, on page 47.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the paragraph will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed, beginning with line 18, page 47.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 48, line 5, after the word "lands," to strike out "$35,000" and insert "$103,728," so as to make the clause read:

For silvicultural, dendrological, and other experiments and investigations independently or in cooperation with other branches of the Federal Government, with States and with individuals, to determine the best methods for the conservative management of forests and forest lands, $103,728;

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 10, after the word "use," to strike out "$105,000: Provided, That $25,000 may be used by the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of ascertaining the appraised value of pasturage upon the national forests, which appraised value, when determined, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be made the basis of the charge for grazing permits upon such forests," and insert "$80,000," so as to make the clause read:

For estimating and appraising timber and other resources on the national forests preliminary to disposal by sale or to the issue of occupancy permits, and for emergency expenses incident to their sale or use, $80,000;

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to this amendment. I am in hearty sympathy with striking out the proposed proviso, just as the committee has done; but when the bill gets into conference the Senate must not yield upon this item, and if there is any likelihood of its doing so I should very much prefer to allow the House provision to go in with an amendment; but under no circumstances would I want them to yield with the House provision stricken out. Therefore I simply take this opportunity to say to the chairman of the committee that if the Senate conferees yield upon this item, I shall feel constrained to call the matter to the attention of the Senate when the conference report comes before the Senate, and ask that the conference report be rejected.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, let me see if I understand the Senator from Utah. My attention was diverted for a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah agrees with what the committee has done.

Mr. GRONNA. In striking out the proviso?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; in striking out the proviso. It is just as the Senator from Utah would have it, and just the way I think those who have studied the situation in detail would have it; but I want to say to the Senator that if this proviso goes back in conference, then I shall ask to have the conference report rejected by the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. I understand that. The Senator is satisfied with the appropriation of $80,000, is he?

Mr. SMOOT. The appropriation is all right. Everything is as it should be, based upon the action of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 48, line 20, after the words "provided for," to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$31,280," so as to make the clause read:

For other miscellaneous forest investigations, and for collating, digesting, recording, illustrating, and distributing the results of the experiments and investigations herein provided for, $31,280.

For conducting the investigations contemplated by the act of May 15, 1862, relating to the application of chemistry to agriculture; for the biological investigation of food and drug products and substances used in the manufacture thereof, including investigations of the physiological effects of such products on the human organism, $70,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 22, after the word "food," to strike out "$52,880" and insert "$62,880," so as to make the clause read:

For investigating the handling, grading, packing, canning, freezing, storing, and transportation of poultry, eggs, fish, shrimp, oysters, and other shellfish, and for experimental shipments of these products, for the utilization of waste products, and the development of new sources of food, $62,880.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, line 1, after the word "therein," to strike out "$579,361" and insert "$629,361," so as to make the paragraph read:

For enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act of June 30, 1906, entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated, or misbranded, or poisonous, or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes"; to cooperate with associations and scientific societies in the revision of the United States Pharmacopoeia and development of methods of analysis, and for investigating the character of the chemical and physical tests which are applied to American food products in foreign countries, and for inspecting the same before shipment when desired by the shippers or owners of these products intended for countries where chemical and physical tests are required before the said products are allowed to be sold therein, $629,361: Provided, That not more than $4,280 shall be used for travel outside of the United States.

The next amendment was, on page 54, after line 3, to insert:

The Secretary of Agriculture shall, from and after the taking effect of this act, execute and perform all the powers and duties conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury by the act approved March 2, 1897 (29 Stat. L., p. 604), entitled "An act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea," as amended by the act approved May 16, 1908 (35 Stat. L., p. 163), entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea,' approved March 2, 1897": Provided, That the bonds given to the United States as security in pursuance of section 1, as amended, shall be subject to the approval only of the collector of customs at the port of entry; that in place of the Board of United States General Appraisers provided for by section 6 of the act, there shall be designated by the Secretary of Agriculture three employees of the Department of Agriculture to serve as the United States board of tea appeals with all the powers and duties conferred by the act on the Board of United States General Appraisers. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $40,000 for carrying into effect the provisions of the aforesaid act until the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, including payment of compensation and expenses of the members of the board appointed under section 2 of the act and all other necessary officers and employees.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is new legislation, and really I do not think it ought to be put upon this bill.

Mr. GRONNA. May I interrupt the Senator to say that this is done at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury? When the law was passed providing for the inspection of tea there was no Agricultural Department; that is, it was not an executive department when that law was first passed.

Mr. SMOOT. The first act, as I remember it, was in 1897, and the amendatory act was approved May 16, 1908.

Mr. GRONNA. It was made an executive department in 1889. Of course, there was an Agricultural Department, but it was not an executive department. I have a letter here from the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Glass, in regard to this subject.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to have the letter read. I do not see why there should be transferred to the Agricultural Department an appropriation of $40,000 for the purpose of carrying out this change when we have already made an appropriation to do this work, and it has been done by and through the Treasury Department for years past.

Mr. GRONNA. Let me say to the Senator that we are appropriating $5,000 less than the money heretofore expended by the Treasury Department for this very work, and the very man employed in the Treasury Department for this purpose will take care of this work in the Agricultural Department. Tea is a food product, as the Senator knows, and it ought to be under the Department of Agriculture. It never ought to have gone to the Treasury Department, and it never would have gone there but for the reason which I have stated.

Mr. SMOOT. This applies only to impure teas imported into the United States, and the question of importation has always been handled by the Treasury Department. But I shall be glad to listen to the letter of the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the letter.

The letter referred to was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, September 29, 1919.

Hon. ASLE J. GRONNA,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture and Forestry,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Inclosed you will find a draft of a provision prepared jointly by the Agricultural Department and my department which I would recommend be inserted in the Agricultural appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1921. This provision provides for the transfer of the administration of the act of March 2, 1897 (29 Stat., 604), as amended by the act of May 6 (35 Stat., 163), from the Treasury Department to the Agricultural Department. No changes are made in the act itself except those of an administrative nature.

This act prohibits the importation of any merchandise as tea which is inferior in purity, quality, and fitness for consumption to standards to be fixed and established annually by the Secretary of the Treasury, and provides that such merchandise finally determined to be inferior in purity, quality, or fitness for consumption to such standard shall be exported or destroyed under customs supervision. This act, unlike most pure-food laws, provides for a physical standard of quality as well as purity. The reason for this is because tea must have a standard of quality if it is to be successfully guarded as a food product, as it is possible to have an absolutely pure tea and yet it might be unfit for consumption. The commercial teas are made from the tender leaves of the tea plant. These young leaves contain the stimulating alkaloid caffeine and a complex constituent which give the commercial teas their value and flavor. It has been determined that the lower leaves of the tea bush not only have practically no stimulating value, but increase materially in tannin, the injurious and deleterious constituent of tea, so that if we did not establish a standard of quality as well as purity it would be possible to import tea made from these lower leaves, which, while pure, would be absolutely devoid of any real tea flavor and which at the same time would be so strong in tannin as to be unfit for consumption. In other words, although all tea is made from the leaves of the tea plant, all tea leaves that are made into tea can not be considered as commercial tea, and to prevent the United States from being the "dumping ground" that it was before the present law was enacted Congress very wisely passed the present tea act, which requires all teas entering the country to be measured by the physical standard that represents the minimum of quality. This law, besides protecting the consumer against spurious adulterations and inferior goods which lack the requisite quality to make them of value as a beverage, also protects the merchant against the flood of worthless trash that would destroy his market.

In viewing the foregoing paragraphs and after studying the history of acts of this kind, which I will review in the following paragraphs, I am convinced that your committee will desire to secure legislation which will effect the transfer of the administration of this act to the Agricultural Department, where all acts of this kind are now administered and where I believe this one rightfully belongs.

As nearly as I can determine, the first legislation conditioning the right of importation upon purity, quality, and wholesomeness of merchandise is contained in the act of Congress approved June 26, 1848 (U. S. Stat., v. 9, p. 237), entitled "An act to prevent the importation of adulterated and spurious drugs and medicines." By the terms of this act the Customs Service of this department is charged with its enforcement.

Probably the next legislation of this kind was the act of Congress approved March 2, 1883 (U. S. Stat., v. 22, p. 451), entitled "An act to prevent the importation of adulterated and spurious teas." The Customs Service of this department was also charged with the administration and enforcement of the provisions of this act.

The next legislation, directed to the prevention of the importation of impure, adulterated, and unwholesome merchandise, is contained in the act of Congress approved August 30, 1890 (U. S. Stat., v. 26, p. 414), entitled "An act providing for the inspection of meats for exportation, prohibiting the importation of adulterated articles of food and drink, and authorizing the President to make proclamation in certain cases, and for other purposes." Under the terms of this statute, the Secretary of Agriculture is charged with its enforcement, so far as it relates to the exportation of meats, and the Secretary of the Treasury is charged with its enforcement, so far as it relates to the importation of adulterated articles of food and drink.

The next legislation on the subject is contained in the act of March 2, 1897, supra, which took the place of the tea act of 1883, above referred to, and which was continued under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department, and the next is the Agricultural appropriation act of March 1, 1899 (U. S. Stat., v. 30, ch. 325, p. 951). This latter act authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the adulteration of foods, drugs, and liquors and prohibits the importation of such articles when found to be dangerous to the health of the people of the United States.

The last mentioned act seems to mark a change in the policy of Congress with respect to the enforcement of legislation directed to the prevention of the importation of spurious, adulterated, impure, unwholesome, and misbranded foods, drugs, and liquors, for in all such legislation prior to this act the Secretary of the Treasury is charged with its enforcement, whereas in the said act the Secretary of Agriculture is given jurisdiction.

The act of August 30, 1890, was followed by the acts of—
May 25, 1900 (U. S. Stat., v. 31, ch. 555, p. 196);
March 2, 1901 (U. S. Stat., v. 31, ch. 805, p. 930);
June 3, 1902 (U. S. Stat., v. 32, ch. 985, p. 296);
March 3, 1903 (U. S. Stat., v. 32, ch. 1008, p. 1157);
April 23, 1904 (U. St. Stat., v. 33, ch. 1486, p. 288);
March 3, 1905 (U. S. Stat., v. 33, ch. 1405, p. 874); and June 30, 1906 (U. S. Stat., v. 34, p. 686).

The successive statutes gradually broaden the scope of governmental control and supervision over the importation of foods, drugs, and liquors, and in each of them the Secretary of Agriculture is given jurisdiction to determine the purity, quality, and wholesomeness of such articles offered for importation, and whether they shall be permitted to enter into consumption in the United States.

The situation is that under existing statutes the Department of Agriculture has jurisdiction to determine the fitness for human consumption and admissibility of all foods, drugs, and liquors offered for importation into the United States, with the single exception of tea, jurisdiction over which remains partly in this department, under the act of March 2, 1897, and partly in the Department of Agriculture, under the food-and-drugs act of June 30, 1906 (26 Op. A. G., 166). In this opinion the Attorney General shows that no repugnancy exists between the special tea-inspection act of March 2, 1897 (29 Stat., 604), and the general food-and-drugs act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat., 768), preventing them from standing together, and that an importation of tea is, therefore, subject to both acts, in that it must equal the standards of quality and purity established by the Secretary of the Treasury under the tea-inspection act and is also subject to the provisions of the food-and-drugs act regarding adulterations, labeling, misbranding and guaranty.

In the opinion of this department both of these acts are necessary to safeguard the public in the matter of tea, and while the one can not be substituted for the other, as they deal with tea in different particulars, at the same time, if the administration of the "tea law" were placed under the Department of Agriculture the work could be coordinated in the department in which this class of work properly belongs.

If your committee has any doubts as to the advisability of this proposed course or desires information, this department will be glad to have a representative familiar with the matter appear before the committee.

A similar letter has been addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives.

Respectfully,
CARTER GLASS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

I concur.

D. F. HOUSTON,
Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this item carries an appropriation of $40,000. I am sure there will be no $40,000 taken off any appropriation made for the Treasury Department because of the transfer of this work. It is virtually the expenditure of an additional $40,000, and I do not know what this appropriation will lead to, but no doubt to greater appropriations in the future with no improvement over present conditions. I do not know how much it will increase in the next few years—nobody can tell; but I do know, Mr. President, that this will not make one penny's difference in the appropriation that will be made for the Treasury Department, and therefore in embarking upon this we are embarking upon a new sea for the expenditure of money.

I can see, of course, that there is some justification for having the testing of tea, as it is a food product, made by the Agricultural Department; but I can not see why the Agricultural Department could not detail a man, or whatever number of employees it would take, to do the necessary testing and have it done under the Treasury Department, which has all of the authority and powers granted to it under existing law.

I recognize the fact that the statement in the letter just read is true, that pure tea is not always wholesome tea, but the amendment goes further than that question. The existing law covers the question of the impurity of tea, and the unwholesomeness of the same, and all classes of that character of tea can be and should be, and are as I understand it, prevented from entering the ports of the United States.

Mr. KENYON. Is not all the machinery set up now? I have never been able to understand just why this transfer should be made. It seems to me to be all right as it is now.

Mr. SMOOT. The transfer is to be made just because it is a food product. If you are going to carry out this principle, we might just as well give the power to the Agricultural Department and the officials of that department to inspect every kind of food product imported into the United States. Then we would have two sets of officials and two sets of investigations made of all the foodstuffs that would enter into the United States, first, as to their purity and wholesomeness; and, second, as to their value and what rates of duty should be imposed.

Mr. KENYON. Is it not true that the Board of General Appraisers now carry on this work?

Mr. SMOOT. They do.

Mr. KENYON. And under this amendment we are appointing a new organization to do the work which has heretofore been done by the Board of General Appraisers?

Mr. THOMAS. Not only a new board but a new appropriation.

Mr. GRONNA. Oh, no.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no doubt that Mr. Mitchell will have this work in hand hereafter, and I have no doubt that there will be a new overhead organization built up in time. The appropriation asked for proves that fact and, as I said, not one penny will be deducted from the appropriations for the Treasury Department.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. Why does the Senator say that? Is it not possible for Congress to strike out the appropriation which is now carried for the purpose of doing this work?

Mr. SMOOT. No; because the appropriation made for it is in the lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. GRONNA. Then let us reduce the lump-sum appropriation $40,000. That is easy.

Mr. SMOOT. That is easier said than done.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator permit me to have another letter read? In view of what the Senator stated, I will ask to have the letter from Mr. Mitchell read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

(Memorandum.)

MARCH 10, 1920.

Subject: Reason why in proposed transfer of tea law the board of tea appeals shall be composed of three employees of the Agricultural Department designated by the Secretary.

The Board of United States General Appraisers was first provided for in the customs administration act of June 10, 1890, which was amended on several occasions, and which was reenacted in the tariff act of 1909. (See sec. 12.) In both the original act and the reenacted act the functions of this board are stated to be solely to review dissatisfactions with any decison of the collector of customs as to the rate or amount of duties chargeable upon imported merchandise. In the reenacted act the Board of General Appraisers and the members thereof were possessed of all the powers of a circuit court of the United States. There was nothing in the tariff act of 1909, which reenacted the act of 1890, which requires the United States Board of General Appraisers to review the findings of the tea examiners, provided for in the tea-inspection act of March 2, 1897.

When the tea-inspection act of March 2, 1897, which deals solely with the quality and purity of imported teas, and which has nothing to do with rates or amounts of duty on tea, became a law, it provided for the members of the Board of United States General Appraisers to act as the board of tea appeals to review the findings of the tea examiners in case of appeals from the findings of the tea examiners; it also provides that the findings of this board shall be final; that three members of this board were designated in the tea law to review the findings of the tea examiners was solely a matter of convenience, and not because they had any special training by reason of their membership on the Board of United States General Appraisers.

In the provision of this bill now before the Senate transferring the tea-inspection act of March 2, 1897, from the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department to that of the Agricultural Department, it is provided that the Secretary of Agriculture shall designate three employees of the Agricultural Department to serve as the United States board of tea appeals, with all the power and duties conferred by the act of the Board of United States General Appraisers. These agricultural employees composing this board will receive no extra compensation for their work, just as the members of the Board of General Appraisers receive no extra compensation for their work on the board of tea appeals. The number of protests that are received by the board of tea appeals are very few, averaging about 106 per annum, and the number of hearings held by this board for consideration of these protests averages about 15 per annum.

The advantages of this board being composed of employees of the Agricultural Department will be many, viz:

First. This board can be selected from scientific men in the department who have had training as food experts.

Second. The choice for membership on this board will not be confined to nine men, as it is at present.

Third. It will not be necessary to shift the membership on this board from year to year, as is done now, and the members will become more proficient in the performance of their work, and their findings will become more uniform.

To transfer the administration of the tea law from the Treasury Department to the Department of Agriculture and to leave the settling of appeals in the former department would be anything but logical.

GEORGE F. MITCHELL,
Supervising Tea Examiner.

* NOTE.—While the present law does not require the personnel of the board of tea appeals to be changed each year, nevertheless it has been the custom to place three different members on the board of tea appeals each year, so that all nine members of the Board of United States General Appraisers might participate equally in this extra work.

G. F. M.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have no other interest in this provision except that, as it was explained to me by Mr. Mitchell, I believed it was in the interest of economy, and from a reading of the letters from the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury, both approving it, it seemed to me that it was a wise thing to do. Anyone who has had anything to do with teas knows that it is rather a large question, and that it is a very important one. Tea is a food product, and it is used as a beverage perhaps fully as much as coffee.

There will be no additional expense. It is simply a transfer from the Treasury Department to the Agricultural Department. I do not agree with the Senator from Utah that it means an increase of appropriations. In making up the estimates it is possible that the Treasury Department has for this year estimated for the work. I know nothing about that, but it is reasonable to suppose that it is the last time it will do so.

Of course, as legislation I realize it is subject to a point of order if anyone cares to make it. I am simply presenting it as I understand it, and I believe that it would ultimately be in the interest of economy and in the interest of the public.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I listened with some care to the communications that were read from the Secretary's desk, and I do not recall anything which indicates that the law as it at present exists has not been properly administered.

Naturally all laws relating to customs and to importations are, and should be, under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Customs, which is supposed to be composed of men of experience and capacity to discharge properly the very important duties that are devolved upon that bureau. If I am correct in my recollection, the wish of the Agricultural Department is not based upon any complaint of improper or defective administration of the law and its various amendments by the bureau under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury.

It is to be assumed that the board of appraisers having charge of the administration of these acts are equipped at present with facilities to enable them to function properly. If that is so, then surely the appropriation provided by this amendment of $40,000 is in addition to an appropriation already in existence and which is being drawn upon by the board of appraisers. That is, for the time being, a duplication of appropriation, since no expression appears in the amendment to the contrary.

I am satisfied, as the Senator from Utah has intimated, that the practical effect of this amendment, if it becomes a law, will be to add another to the various agencies which have grown up in the various departments and have for their respective purposes the administration of specific laws, and I have no particle of doubt that ultimately it will ripen into a bureau or a division having its separate equipment of employees and of appropriations, and, like all others, arrogating as much power to itself as is possible as time shall pass.

Inasmuch, therefore, as no complaint appears and no charge is made regarding a maladministration of the law as it now stands, I am compelled to make a point of order against the amendment as an attempt to incorporate general legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, before the Chair rules on the point of order, I had overlooked the fact that the bill, on page 56, as passed by the House, has a provision very similar to the provision against which the Senator now makes the point of order. I want to inquire of the Chair if the amendment is subject to a point of order when practically the same provision is carried in the bill as it came from the House? There is only a slight difference, I will say to the Senator from Colorado, in the two provisions.

Mr. HARRISON. In other words, this is an amendment of the provision in the House text?

Mr. GRONNA. Exactly.

Mr. HARRISON. And it is not subject to a point of order?

Mr. GRONNA. I believe not. When I recalled that the provision was carried substantially in the bill as passed by the House, I believe that I was mistaken in saying that the amendment is subject to a point of order. It is not new matter. It comes from the House, and the committee have simply amended it, and I do not believe it is subject to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Standing alone, the Chair would be inclined to hold the amendment subject to the point of order; but being an amendment of a House provision, the Chair thinks it is not subject to the point of order, and therefore overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to have it put to a vote.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and was interrupted by,

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senate committee amendment is not the same as the provision in the House bill.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Utah was absent when I stated to the Chair that upon examining the bill, on page 56, there would be found a provision in the House bill practically identical with the Senate committee amendment, but amended in some particulars, as the committee had a perfect right to amend it. For that reason it is not subject to a point of order, and the Chair has so decided.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the case, then we ought to have accepted the House provision as it was with an amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. That is what we have done.

Mr. SMOOT. But the committee went to work and struck out entirely the provision on pages 56 and 57 as if the House had not acted and they put a new provision in its place. I first thought it was simply a transfer of the item to a different part of the bill, but I find it is not that. I do not want to call for a quorum——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated that standing alone he would be inclined to rule that the amendment was subject to the point of order, but in view of the matter on pages 56 and 57, which is substantially the same, as the Chair understands from the Senator from North Dakota as the item reported by the committee, it was not subject to the point of order, and the Chair so ruled.

Mr. SMOOT. The ruling of the Chair would have been——

Mr. GRONNA. I do not wish to take the Senator off his feet or off the floor, but I desire to say that this question has been ruled upon, and other business has been transacted while the Senator was absent from the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I can call for a quorum.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator desires that, it is all right, but I do not want to go back. The point of order was raised; the Chair has decided the question and has been sustained, and, I repeat, other business has been transacted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator that he has ruled on the question.

Mr. GRONNA. It is too late now to make the point of order.

Mr. THOMAS. The only business which has been transacted has been to submit the question to a vote.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary had resumed and was proceeding with the reading of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall reserve the right to have a decision on this matter when the bill reaches the Senate.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 55, line 15, after the word "fungicides," to strike out "$20,000" and insert "$25,000," so as to make the clause read:

For the investigation and development of methods of manufacturing insecticides and fungicides, and for investigating chemical problems relating to the composition, action, and application of insecticides and fungicides, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 23, after the word "waste," to strike out "$6,000" and insert "$9,000," so as to make the clause read:

For the investigation and development of methods of utilizing wool-scouring waste, $9,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 24, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$855,401" and insert "$967,401," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $967,401.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 56, to strike out:

Enforcement of the tea importation act: The Secretary of Agriculture shall, from and after the taking effect of this act, execute and perform all the powers and duties conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury by the act approved March 2, 1897 (29 Stat. L., p. 604), entitled "An act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea," as amended by the act approved May 16, 1908 (35 Stat. L., p. 163), entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea,' approved March 2, 1897": Provided, That the bonds given to the United States as security in pursuance of section 1, as amended, shall be subject to the approval only of the collector of customs at the port of entry; that in place of the Board of United States General Appraisers provided for by section 6 of the act, there shall be designated by the Secretary of Agriculture three employees of the Department of Agriculture to serve as the United States board of tea appeals with all the powers and duties conferred by the act on the Board of United States General Appraisers. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $40,000 for carrying into effect the provisions of the aforesaid act until the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, including payment of compensation and expenses of the members of the board appointed under section 2 of the act and all other necessary officers and employees.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 3, after the word "Chemistry," to strike out "$1,321,591" and insert "$1,393,591," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Chemistry, $1,393,591.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Soils," on page 57, line 9, before the word "clerks" where it occurs the first time, to strike out "five" and insert "seven"; in the same line, before the word "clerks" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "ten" and insert "thirteen"; in line 10, after the words "class one," to strike out "seven clerks, at $1,000 each"; in line 13, before the word "draftsmen," to strike out "six" and insert "eight"; and in line 14, before the word "one," to strike out "two draftsmen, at $1,000 each."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to say that I understand there has been a very material reduction in the amount of the appropriation for the Bureau of Soils. A certain part of this money, as I understand, has been expended in making surveys of soils and for other examinations.

Mr. GRONNA. Let me say to the Senator that the Senate committee struck out altogether the provision which will be found at the bottom of page 58 and at the top of page 59, involving an appropriation of $178,900. Several Senators, however, have requested when we reach this paragraph that it may be passed over, and I have no objection to that.

Mr. POMERENE. I simply wish to make a suggestion. My attention was called to the matter in the first place by Prof. Charles Thorn, who is the director of the Ohio Agricultural Experiment Station at Wooster, Ohio. I know he is a very high-class man, not only professionally but personally, and I have every confidence that he would not make any complaint in this regard if he did not feel that his duty to the people of the State of Ohio required him to do so. He is very anxious to have this item restored, and while I confess that I am not very familiar with it, I do know that the Bureau of Soils has been doing excellent work, and that they are constantly appealed to by the farmers in all sections of the State.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that a great number of high-class men are very much in favor of this appropriation. I have received several letters from my own State from some very excellent men in reference to the subject, protesting bitterly against the elimination of this paragraph. If it were not for the fact that we are trying to economize, the action proposed would not be taken; in normal times the committee would not think of striking out this provision, but it is believed that this work can be deferred.

As the Senator knows, in connection with the soil survey work men go throughout the various States, and I was told that most of the money under this item would be expended in my own State—and I dislike to have to acknowledge that on the floor of the Senate, as I know it will go into the RECORD—but I said "it makes no difference if it does go to my State." I have the names of a number of counties in my State in which it was intended to make soil surveys.

Mr. POMERENE. I mean no reflection on the Senator's State, but I think a good part of the appropriation ought to go there, as well as to other States. It is said our farmers do not understand intensive farming, and there is some foundation for that claim, particularly in certain sections. I think that we are not only benefiting the farmers themselves, but we are benefiting the entire population of this country when we do anything toward the betterment of the soil and the study of fertilizers in connection with the soil, and I think that it is false economy to cut out an appropriation of this character.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not disagree with the Senator. I believe that it is a valuable work; it is important that men should go out and examine the soil and make out their charts and their analyses so that they may be used by the people in the various sections of the country wherever a survey is made; but this work can be deferred for at least a year or two, and if we can save many appropriations of $100,000 or $200,000 in the aggregate they will make up a great total running into the millions. It is for that reason only that the committee has recommended striking out this item; there is no excuse for such action, I will say to the Senator, except in the interest of economy.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think that same argument could be made against practically every other item in this bill. I can only repeat that I regard it as false economy when by an expenditure of a little money in this way we can benefit the agricultural interests and thereby the interests of the entire country. Although we have not yet reached it, I hope that the amendment will not be agreed to when it comes to be considered.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, may I ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understood him to say that he had requested that the paragraph referred to by the Senator from Ohio be passed over.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and also the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], who is now occupying the chair, have requested that this particular paragraph be passed over when it is reached.

Mr. POMERENE. I am glad we have the sympathy of the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, it may be necessary for me to be absent during a part of the consideration of this bill, and I wish to take this occasion to say that I have been surprised at the number of letters which have been received in regard to this very point. They have not come from my State to any extent, although I have received some, but from perhaps 20 States, and, while not addressed to me directly, they have been shown to be my others, or I have been told about them. I am amazed to find how great a desire is expressed by the farmers throughout the country that this particular work of cooperating with the Federal Government in the surveying and plotting of the soil should be continued in order that information may be furnished as to the constituent elements of the soil, the character of fertilizer needed, the best processes of drainage, whether tile or open ditch, and numerous other matters.

Mr. POMERENE. I am quite satisfied the Senator would receive complaints from his State——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have.

Mr. POMERENE. But he has been so diligent in telling them that they need nitrates down there that everybody knows that fact in South Carolina; but they do not know what character of fertilizer they need in some of the other States; and so at the present time I am appealing to the Senator from South Carolina for aid to have this provision retained.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The farm survey in my State, I presume, has covered as much territory as in other States. I understand that there are very few counties that have not been surveyed under the cooperation of Clemson College and the Federal Government, and the character of the work has been very satisfactory. I presume those counties that have not been surveyed are of such homogeneity with those that have been surveyed that they are more or less in a position to benefit by the observations in other counties; but I can understand how a wonderful benefit has accrued to my State from this work, resulting in the saving of millions of dollars, both in informing the farmers as to the character of the soil and what was needed to improve it, as well as in regard to drainage and other matters affecting putting it in condition for the best return.

I am glad to hear the chairman of the committee say that this matter will be still further considered; and I want to take this occasion, in case I should be absent, to say that so far as I am concerned, having gotten the information that I have, I would be rather in favor of restoring this appropriation, even if we had to curtail somewhere else.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the appropriation just spoken of, amounting to $178,900, for the investigation of soils, is stricken from the bill, then I think I shall want to offer some amendment as to the salaries in the bureau. In other words, the work that is required here in the District of Columbia that comes to the department after the soil survey is made within the States would be considerable, and I do not think we will need as many clerks if this work is not carried on as we will if it is; so I give notice now that if we do strike out this item I shall want to return to the other one.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I think I ought to state for the RECORD that when this paragraph was stricken out by the Senate committee Mr. Harrison, the Assistant to the Secretary of Agriculture, was assisting the Senate committee, and, of course, he protested most bitterly; but so far as the number of men employed in this particular work is concerned, I will say to the Senator that it is only the number required outside of the Bureau of Soils.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps the Senator did not understand me. The men that are employed directly for this work in the field are paid out of the $178,900, but that work after it is done in the field is reported to the department here in Washington, and then the work of disseminating the information and the result from the expenditure of the appropriation is done by the clerks in the bureau.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I agree that there would be more work to do if we give these field agents the money to go out and make the examination. There would, of course, be increased work, and if that is not done it might be possible that we could reduce the clerks by one or two.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, with reference to the item of $178,900 stricken out by the committee for the investigation of soils, I have had a number of letters from my State against striking out this appropriation. They say that it is one of the most valuable of the appropriations; that it is doing the farming industry of our State an immense amount of good by giving the farmers information as to what kind of fertilizer is necessary for their soil, and they do not think it ought to be stricken out; and I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment striking it out.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, every Senator knows that wherever there is an agricultural college there is going to be a protest against striking this item out of the bill. It goes into the States and passes through the agricultural departments of the States, and we know very well that wherever there is an item stricken from the appropriation bill there will be a protest; but I did not base my statement as to the value of this work merely on the fact that there was a protest from any State or from any institution within the State.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course I know that the Senator is correct about basing a protest on that fact, and that would not be a sufficient basis for the action of the Senate; but if this is a good work, and is for the benefit of the farmers in the various farming States, as I am advised that it is, I think we ought to keep this item in. I think if it has been heretofore found to be a good work, the mere fact that it is done through agricultural colleges is no reason why it should be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 57, line 17, before the word "two," to strike out "one messenger or laborer, $480"; in line 18, after the word "each," to insert "one messenger or laborer, $660"; and in line 20, after the words "in all," to strike out "$78,060" and insert "$78,040," so as to read:

One messenger, $840; 2 messenger boys, at $480 each; 1 messenger or laborer, $660; 3 laborers, at $600 each; 1 laborer, $300; 1 charwoman or laborer, $480; in all, $78,040.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, line 11, after the word "survey," to strike out "$23,110" and insert "$25,610," so as to make the clause read:

For chemical investigations of soil types, soil composition, and soil minerals, the soil solution, solubility of soil, and all chemical properties of soils in their relation to soil formation, soil texture, and soil productivity, including all routine chemical work in connection with the soil survey, $25,610.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, after line 20, to strike out:

For the investigation of soils, in cooperation with other branches of the Department of Agriculture, other departments of the Government, State agricultural experiment stations, and other State institutions, and for indicating upon maps and plats, by coloring or otherwise, the results of such investigations, $178,900.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let that be passed over.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that the amendment be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he knows what the result has been from past appropriations for exploration and investigation within the United States to determine possible sources of supply of potash, nitrates, and other natural fertilizers. That appropriation has been carried in the bill for quite a number of years past, and I should like to know whether any report has ever been made.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I can not say that I have read many of these reports. I will say, however, that that question came up before the committee, and we took up this very paragraph, among others, and discussed it with Mr. Harrison, and one of the experts in the Department of Agriculture called me out of the Chamber one day and called my attention to the importance of this work.

A great deal of criticism has been made with reference to the expenditure of money for the manufacture of potash from kelp. It has been generally understood that the results have been bad. We were informed that the Department of Agriculture will sell this year from the plant in California, where they manufacture potash from kelp, more than a million dollars' worth of potash; and when we take into consideration the fact that the Government of the United States did not go into this work merely for the purpose of making it a commercial proposition, but that it is an important scientific work, and when we realize what it has been, especially during the war, it seems to me that this kind of work ought to go on.

The paragraph which we are passing upon just at the moment provides only for research, and I will say to the Senator from Utah that I believe very great and important work is being done both with reference to nitrates and with reference to potash.

Mr. SMOOT. The appropriation, however, is not made for research. All that it is made for is for exploration and investigation to determine possible sources of supply of potash, nitrates, and so forth.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; that is true.

Mr. SMOOT. I think almost any Senator here can tell you that there are sources in the United States from which these materials can be derived.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I do not think he has put a broad enough meaning on the phrase "determine possible sources." The chairman of the committee is right when he says that they investigate the availability of the sources. They may find potash in some of the rocks. There are reports out in reference to it. I have one now where they report on the matter of kelp, I think, in the Senator's State. They investigated some of the potash rock there, and they also have investigated the green shales both of the New England States and of the Southern States, to ascertain their potash content, and the practicability of extracting it in commercial quantities.

Mr. SMOOT. We all know that. When that investigation is completed, and a report is made, I think it will show that if the potash deposits that are known now in the United States are developed, this country can be furnished with potash for the next thousand years.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator is aware of the fact that the freight from the Pacific coast and from his State to the great fertilizer-using sections of this country is prohibitive.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly why it seems to me that this appropriation ought to be for a different purpose than that named in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But, if the Senator will allow me to conclude, that freight will not be prohibitive if the fact can be established that potash can be economically produced in those sections, because I think that since Congress has charge of the public carriers of this country, if America has a supply of this material, certainly we ought to be able to bring it across the continent and furnish it to our people as cheaply as it can be brought across the ocean from the potash wells of Germany and sold here. I think, therefore, that this investigation is entirely justified; and not only that, but it is my impression now—I have not the old law before me—that this is a smaller appropriation than has been carried heretofore.

Mr. SMOOT. What I had in mind was this: Whenever an appropriation is made for any particular purpose in any appropriation bill, it remains there forever unless some one calls attention to it. Nobody is more interested in the original appropriation for this purpose than I. I thought it was very wise, and I think now that perhaps it would be a splendid thing for Congress to make an appropriation to find out the best methods of extracting potash and the best methods of handling it, rather than to make an appropriation here to determine the possible sources of supply in the United States. Take the State of Wyoming: There is enough potash rock in the State of Wyoming to furnish potash to the United States for the next 100 years, and that rock is in sight to-day. It is worth nothing unless it is for its potash content.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But the method of extracting it is too costly.

Mr. SMOOT. They have already erected a large plant there, and I think it more than likely that it will not be very long until that plant is perfected to the point where thousands of tons of the very highest grade of potash will be produced in that State. I would rather see an appropriation made for the purpose of determining the best method of extracting the potash, and how to get it to the States that need it than to have an appropriation here to determine the possible sources of supply of potash.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Would not the Senator think this money was well spent if this investigation goes on solely for the purpose of discovering new sources of supply, if they do discover a valuable source of supply contiguous to the territory that uses it in such great quantities? I am sure the discovery of the green shales on the Atlantic seaboard was a valuable one and also the by-product from this blackstrap molasses.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, we all understood that before. The only question was as to its location and the transportation question involved.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I would not be surprised at any time if these investigations reveal a source we now know nothing of.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not wish to take the Senators from the floor, but this is not a committee amendment. It is a provision which comes from the House.

Mr. SMOOT. That makes no difference. The amendment of the committee was presented, and any Senator can speak upon it.

Mr. GRONNA. But the Senator was considering the paragraph beginning in line 18.

Mr. SMOOT. I was, but I can speak on any part of the bill I desire. I am not out of order, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not want to prolong the discussion needlessly, but this appropriation is such an admirable illustration of the way the United States does business that I feel justified in briefly commenting upon it.

The purpose of this paragraph is to appropriate $36,840 for exploration and investigation within the United States to determine possible sources of supply of potash, nitrates, and natural fertilizers. In other words, Government agents and so-called Government experts will be authorized under this appropriation, and have been authorized under similar appropriations, to make investigations and explorations; and what do they amount to? In the first place, there is no inducement to discover or ascertain the subject matter of the appropriation, for once it has been accomplished the occupation of the official is lost and gone; he must either seek new sources of activity or he must continue his search. I do not know of any instance—there may be some, but I can recall none—where work of this kind, carried on by Government officials under Government appropriations, ever accomplished anything. The great deposits of metallic ores and of rare minerals have been exploited and exposed by private initiative, and that initiative has been stimulated by the prospect of gain. That is elemental in human nature, and it always will be.

As the Senator from Utah has said, there is plenty of potash in the United States, and there is sufficient talent and genius, chemical and otherwise, now dormant in the United States to make these deposits commercially available. The difficulty is, however, that no private incentive exists to attract private investigation along these lines. The Government has segregated these lands from private occupation and does not permit them to be exploited except under conditions that are not attractive to the men who would like to engage in that sort of business. Senators representing States needing this identical fertilizer to my certain knowledge have joined in the enactment of just that sort of legislation, with the best of motives, of course, and unquestionably from a desire to subserve the interests of the country, but unfortunately they have paralyzed that enterprise which is necessary to secure these much-needed natural resources.

The great phosphorus beds of Florida were not discovered by Government agency. It was private enterprise, stimulated by the desire for gain, which brought those valuable elements into the market and which has done so much to stimulate agricultural interests the world over. I prophesy that you can make this appropriation for the next 25 years and you will have nothing to show for it at the end of that time.

If the Government will say to the American citizen, as it once said, "Go upon the public domain, investigate it, examine it, exploit it, and if you discover anything which is sufficiently attractive, locate it, and we will give you a patent," there will be some incentive for private enterprise to enter this field of activity. A few years ago I knew of a number of men who went into Wyoming, two or three of them engineers and chemists, for the purpose of investigating the potash deposits, and locating and developing them if their investigations were satisfactory. They made tests of the rock, all practical tests, and satisfied themselves of the prospect of a good business, and made their locations under the laws of the United States accordingly. When their locations came to Washington for patent, they were subjected to investigation, and after the investigation they were turned down. That is under the new dispensation, the offspring of Mr. Gifford Pinchot and the cult of the Pinchot association. The result is that these great potash beds have not been subjected to exploitation. The Government will not do it; the Government can not do it.

The way in which to ascertain where these beds are, what their possible sources of supply may be, and how they are best to be developed is the good old way of relying upon individual initiative and depending upon the confidence which the individual has in himself. Instead of that we have the modern Government way, to withhold all the resources of nature from the people, suspect the honesty and integrity of every citizen desiring to investigate, adopt a leasehold policy, and fix royalties at a point which no sensible or prudent man cares to consider, and then make an appropriation under the terms and conditions of which a lot of scholastic gentlemen, excellent people, theorists, may go out with their microscopes and other paraphernalia and examine into the crystallizations of rock and report progress.

Nowadays, Mr. President, we shoot vermin and predatory animals by Government order, and we have extended our civil service so far as to arm officials with shotguns and pay them so much a day to kill skunks and prairie dogs. A man earns just as much sitting by a good fire and shooting such animals as are attracted by curiosity or otherwise within his range as he will by going out and doing a day's business. I have no doubt the time will come when all these various agencies will be similarly exercised and provided for, and just so long as it is done we will depend upon foreign countries for very essential elements needed in agriculture and in the other pursuits of life. Let us go back to the good old way of doing business, where men are men, who do not need the Government for a wet nurse whenever anything is to be done requiring the exercise of capacity or involving the danger of expense. I think that this entire item should be eliminated from the bill, because it is in the end nothing but a sheer waste of the public money.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 16, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$462,975" and insert "$286,575," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $286,575.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 17, after the word "Soils," to strike out "$541,035" and insert "$364,615," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Soils, $364,615.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Entomology," on page 59, line 23, before the word "clerks" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "ten" and insert "eleven"; in line 25, before the word "clerks," to strike out "eight" and insert "six"; on page 60, line 3, after "$1,200," to strike out "1 entomological preparator, $1,000" and insert "4 entomological preparators, at $1,000 each"; in line 9, after the word "each," to strike out "1 laborer, $540; 1 laborer, $480"; and in line 11, after the words "in all," to strike out "$132,810" and insert "$134,390," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, Bureau of Entomology: One entomologist, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk and executive assistant, $2,250; 1 administrative assistant, $2,250; 1 editor, $2,250; 1 financial clerk, $1,800; 5 clerks, class 4; 11 clerks, class 3; 18 clerks, class 2; 25 clerks, class 1; 6 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 insect delineator, $1,600; 2 insect delineators, at $1,400 each; 2 entomological draftsmen, at $1,400 each; 1 entomological draftsman, $1,080; 1 photographer, $1,200; 4 entomological preparators, at $1,000 each; 4 entomological preparators, at $840 each; 8 entomological preparators, at $720 each; 1 laborer, $1,080; 2 messengers or laborers, at $900 each; 1 messenger or laborer, $840; 3 messengers or laborers, at $720 each; 6 messenger boys, at $480 each; 2 charwomen, at $480 each; 3 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $134,390.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 61, line 3, after the word "available," to strike out "Provided, That $9,600 of said sum shall be available for the investigation of insects affecting the pecan and method of control of same," so as to make the clause read:

For investigations of insects affecting deciduous fruits, orchards, vineyards, and nuts, $178,500, of which $30,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 61, line 11, after the words "Argentine ant," to strike out "$125,000" and insert "$170,000," so as to make the clause read:

For investigations of insects affecting southern field crops, including insects affecting cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar cane, etc., and the cigarette beetle and Argentine ant, $170,000, of which sum $25,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, the last paragraph read being as follows:

For investigations of insects affecting truck crops, including insects affecting the potato, sugar beet, cabbage, onion, tomato, beans, peas, etc., and insects affecting stored products, $110,000.

Mr. HARRISON. I have an amendment that I want to offer to the paragraph just read. Are individual amendments now in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They are not.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want to lose my right to offer an amendment to that provision.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 62, line 2, after the word "insects," to strike out "$52,330" and insert "$62,330," so as to make the clause read:

For investigations, identification, and systematic classification of miscellaneous insects, including the study of insects affecting the health of man and domestic animals, household insects, and the importation and exchange of useful insects, $62,330.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 62, line 7, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$740,670" and insert "$795,670," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $795,670.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, line 3, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$302,650," so as to make the clause read:

Preventing spread of moths, Bureau of Entomology: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the continued spread of the gypsy and brown-tail moths by conducting such experiments as may be necessary to determine the best methods of controlling these insects; by introducing and establishing the parasites and natural enemies of these insects and colonizing them within the infested territory; by establishing and maintaining a quarantine against further spread in such manner as is provided by the general nursery-stock law, approved August 20, 1912, as amended, entitled "An act to regulate the importation of nursery stock and other plants and plant products, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain quarantine districts for plant diseases and insect pests, to permit and regulate the movements of fruits, plants, and vegetables therefrom, and for other purposes," in cooperation with the authorities of the different States concerned and with the several State experiment stations, including rent outside of the District of Columbia, the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses, $302,650.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the chairman of the committee for a moment, in this appropriation under the title "preventing the spread of moths," the House appropriated $200,000. It is proposed to increase that by the Senate committee amendment to $302,650. May I ask what was the appropriation last year?

Mr. GRONNA. It was $304,000, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I have had a large number of communications from Ohio bearing on the subject and one of them from the entomologist from the Ohio Agricultural Experiment Station. He suggests that $400,000 would not go any further in the prosecution of this work than the appropriation of last year, due to the increased cost of the work. I think the work is so very important that I should dislike very much to see the department crippled for want of funds.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that the committee took that into consideration, but the experts who appeared before our committee believed that they could get along with $302,000 as provided in the amendment. We realize that much important work is being done by the experts, and that it is necessary to provide ample funds for the continuance of the work.

Mr. THOMAS. May I inquire of the Senator having charge of the bill what progress is being made in this investigation toward the accomplishment of the end desired? These moths seem to flourish along with the appropriations.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that the country infested with these moths has been, as the Senator knows, mostly in the Eastern and New England States. I understand, from the reports and from the statements made by the experts, that a great deal of work has been done; in fact, they have been able to keep the insects from spreading. I could read from the report which I have here showing that at one time the gypsy moth had gone as far west as New York.

The Senator, of course, realizes, perhaps better than I do, the difficulty of exterminating or eradicating this moth. It is not an easy matter to do. It is a good deal like the boll weevil in the South. We have not been able to eradicate completely the boll weevil, but the department has been able to eradicate it in certain sections and the department has also been able to keep it from spreading.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, the Senator knows that they are erecting monuments to the boll weevil down in Alabama.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Colorado told me the other day that they are erecting such monuments. Nevertheless, it is important that sufficient sums of money shall be appropriated to eradicate these pests. It must be done.

I want to say to the Senator from Ohio that I believe the work can be done with the amount provided for in the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Colorado has asked a question with reference to the gypsy moth. I have here before me a signed statement by Mr. N. H. Shaw, secretary of agriculture of the State of Ohio; Mr. E. C. Totten, chief of the Bureau of Horticulture; Prof. Herbert Osborne, professor of entomology, Ohio State University; and T. H. Parks, extension entomologist of the Ohio State University. In discussing this subject, after speaking of the crippling of the department because of insufficient funds, it is stated that:

This is particularly true in the case of the gypsy-moth work, where the reduction of one-third from the amount previously appropriated is little less than a calamity. However, this reduction, if consummated, would be in line with the disastrous and expensive policy of temporizing that has hitherto marked legislative efforts in connection with the control of this pest.

Beginning about 1890 the State of Massachusetts made liberal annual appropriations, until the insect was well under control and, in fact, far on the way toward eradication, when the cry of "economy" caused the legislature to cut off the appropriations. This false economy and the resulting cessation of control work for a period of four years was directly responsible for a rapid increase and spread of the insect and the necessity for the expenditure of large sums by State and Federal Governments since 1902. Now that the work is again beginning to show results the cry of "economy" is again heard, which, if successful in its purpose, will practically nullify and bring to naught the really remarkable results attained through the expenditure of State and Federal funds. When this insect again becomes serious, as it unquestionably will if the appropriations are reduced, we will have to begin again, not where we left off in 1920 but back where we were in 1902.

The request for an addition of one-third to the amount previously appropriated was in our opinion very conservative, for the additional sum is not commensurate with the advance in the cost of labor and materials.

I think that practically demonstrates the situation, at least as it appears to these men who have given special attention to the subject.

Mr. THOMAS. I am glad to know that some progress is being made in that direction. I asked the question very largely from curiosity, because when the subject of the boll weevil is reached I want to call the attention of the Senate to some eulogies that are being pronounced upon that very interesting little insect in certain parts of the South, where it seems to be regarded more as a benefactor than as a pest.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I think if the Senator from Colorado understood the situation he would not indulge in this seeming humor about the erection of monuments to the boll weevil. People who had been, as we call it, running on the one-crop plan of planting cotton, when the boll weevil came in such disastrous numbers that he killed the cotton crop out so that it was impossible to plant, found that by planting peanuts in certain tracts they could get a better return than they did from their cotton. What would be the condition of the producers of this country if all the territory now planted in cotton were to be planted in the insignificant and negligible crops that have been so very profitable to these people?

The Senator must understand that we are face to face now with the calamity of losing our monopoly of the world's greatest staple through the inroads of this miserable little insect. Sixteen million bales of cotton were produced in 1914 and the rapid spread of this insect over the cotton States has reduced that crop in the last five years to an average of only 11,000,000 bales, entailing a loss in the five years of 20,000,000 bales of cotton running up into billions of dollars, meaning that unless we can find some method of handling it—and we have found no method of stopping his progress over the country there, but we have found a method by which we can make a partial crop—the billion dollars of European gold that has been brought into this country and exchanged for our manufactured and raw cotton will have to be surrendered to some one else.

There are untold millions of dollars in the form of cottonseed meal and cottonseed hulls, which in the Senator's own State are finding a market and a valuable place in competition with his grain and his hay. All cattle raisers as far west and south as Colorado and New Mexico, and all down to the Mexican border, find there is no feed on earth that will put cattle in condition for the market and put on as much fat in a short time as will the use of cottonseed meal. Just night before last we had an illustration of the way the soil is being depleted, and the sources of renewing it by virtue of artificial fertilizers are being exhausted; and the marvelous statement was made that in place of 80 per cent of the by-product known as cottonseed meal, out of which is extracted the oil which has heretofore been used as fertilizer, practically this entire output of the enormous southern cotton crop is now used in the form of cattle feed.

Why should Senators stand here and absolutely eulogize the poor, foolish individuals who, taking the little local view the Senator from Colorado seems to commend, that because they can raise a few bushels of peanuts and a few head of cattle a little more profitably in their locality than they have been able to raise cotton under the boll-weevil conditions, therefore they would erect a monument to the boll weevil because he enabled them to plant peanuts and make a little more than they had made out of the cotton under adverse conditions?

I think the Senate ought to understand here this afternoon that there has appeared now an insect which probably will menace the corn crop of this country, known as the miserable corn borer, threatening the entire corn crop. You can not get the farmers of this country nor disinterested parties to go out and study the habits and varieties of this insect and prepare some way to combat it.

You have the gypsy moth and you have the San Jose scale. I have here before me this afternoon a comparative statement of the loss to the apple crop from insects. I presume it would be quite as logical for the apple growers of the Northwest, if temporarily during the apple season they could go out and raise a few angora goats where they had raised apples and make a little more than they had made out of apples, to raise a monument to the little insects that destroy the great apple industry of this country. I take this occasion, Mr. President, to deplore the fact that Senators scrutinize and criticize the number of dollars that are included in agricultural appropriation bills without apparently having an intelligent idea of what has been the result of the expenditure of those dollars in the past years. I think it is the duty of a Senator to scrutinize the expenditure of public money when he is charged with the responsibility of appropriating it, but I think it is equally his duty to understand what is being done with and what is the result of such expenditures.

I confidently state here this afternoon that there is not a department of the Government that has been of as much benefit to the American people as has the Agricultural Department, nor has there been as little extravagance and as little useless expenditure of money in any other department as there has been in the Department of Agriculture. Only the other day there appeared before us the new Secretary of Agriculture, deploring the fact that we had trimmed the Agricultural appropriation bill as we had, particularly in reference to certain divisions and salaries. He furnished a list of some 40 or 50 men, bright, trained scientists, who had worked patriotically and loyally to discharge the responsibilities which were put upon them, to help the great agricultural interests of the country to produce for the benefit of 110,000,000 American people. These men of necessity being responsible for their wives and children, and being in the earning period of their lives, have been offered four or five times as much by private institutions as they were offered under the Government, and so necessarily under existing conditions they have accepted.

He stated that we could not retain the best talent in this country on the meager salaries being paid, and in addition to that have Congress every time the Agricultural bill comes up rawhide these men as being parasites, barnacles on the public, and as giving no quid pro quo.

I think the committee ought to invite scrutiny of their work, investigation, and criticism; but it has become popular for Senators to stand on the floor of the Senate and laugh to scorn the very source from which three times every day they go and replenish their energy. After having gone into the dining room and eaten the products of the farm and field they then come back and scorn and sneer at the efforts that the Government is making to help those who are the most notoriously helpless of all the great classes of our workmen.

The manufacturers are necessarily organized; they are artificial producers; they can control their seasons and their output. The agriculturist when he has made his investment in the soil and purchased land, stock, and material then has to wait upon the caprices of an uncertain season as to whether or not he will get any return. Yet when we come to make appropriations and to extend help to that class of people there is a perfect chorus of criticism here that we are squandering the people's money when we are only trying to help these men in their struggle against the uncertainty of the seasons and also against the inroads of insects and all kinds of destructive fungus and other plant diseases. We are met with this unjust criticism whenever we bring in an Agricultural appropriation bill.

I do not know to what extent it is possible to eradicate any of these pests; but I do know that millions upon millions of dollars have been added to the meat supply of the country by the actually demonstrated eradication of what is known as the cattle tick, the carrier of Texas fever. I know that the Agricultural Department in developing vaccine has added millions upon millions of dollars to the meat supply by holding in check hog cholera. You and I know that the outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease a year or two ago was promptly checked and finally stamped out by the Agricultural Department. Who can calculate the millions of dollars thereby saved to the people? Yet whenever any little item comes up on the Agricultural appropriation bill some great economist stands on the floor of the Senate and scrutinizes it, as to whether or not the money has been properly expended.

We ought to give the farmers all the encouragement possible. The total appropriation in this bill is less than the cost of one battleship, and yet every battleship in America is dependent upon the appropriations contained in this bill. I think it is time for us all to join hands and do what we can to encourage "the man with the hoe."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina is always supersensitive when any criticism is made or any information is requested regarding items of appropriation in the Agricultural appropriation bill. There is no question that the Department of Agriculture has accomplished a great deal of good in the country and has been the source of infinite benefit to the farming communities throughout the land. It is equally true, however, that the Agricultural bill has become the nesting-place for more little, unnecessary, and seemingly experimental appropriations than any other one appropriation bill that we have to consider. I have had occasion heretofore to criticize a number of these so-called appropriations, and so long as I am here I propose to exercise my right of criticizing others.

I try to distinguish—with what success others must determine—between appropriations that are needful and appropriations which experience demonstrates lead nowhere, as well as approprations that are designed to do for the farmer what he can do a great deal better for himself. I recall an appropriation of several thousand dollars designed to instruct the farmer upon the farm how to make sauerkraut or cottage cheese. Possibly that was a very useful appropriation, but I am inclined to think that the average farmer's wife could come down here and give the Agricultural Department a great deal more instruction along those lines than any so-called expert could give to any farming community in the United States; and so with a great many other appropriations which I might mention, but I will not take the time to do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator get letters from farmers and farmers' wives in his State very regularly asking for bulletins as to all these matters?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that my own experience has been that the farmers of my State receive very valuable information from the reports of different investigations and from the advice that is given to them and to their families by the Agricultural Department. If we want to save money it seems to me that we can find other departments of the Government in connection with which we might save a great deal more than by attempting to save the small appropriations that go to the Agricultural Department. It is the most important institution that we have to deal with, and we ought, in my opinion, to build it up in every possible way.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the thing that we are discussing is always the most important when it comes to economy; it makes no difference what it is.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator, in all fairness, think that the agricultural interests of this country are the most important of all its interests?

Mr. THOMAS. I think that it is one of the most important interests in the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. I take issue with the Senator, for I think it is the most important, because without it we could not live at all.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator does not take issue with me at all; the Senator expresses his opinion, and I express mine; at least, I answer his question. The Senator asks me if I do not get requests for bulletins from people in my State. I answer, "Yes, I do;" and I receive a great many other requests. I receive requests for appropriations under this bill which I have not the audacity to present to the committee, and I have no doubt that many similar requests come to other Senators. That is the difficulty. The people are becoming so dependent upon the Government of the United States that they are losing all initiative, and the time is rapidly coming when even the farmers, who are noted for their initiative, will have the same sense of self-dependence, and will come to the Government of the United States for relief from every conceivable ill which is either actual or apprehended.

It would appear possibly from the comments that have been made by the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from South Carolina that I am making a specialty of attacking the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will not include me in that category.

Mr. THOMAS. And that I allow all other bills considered by the Senate to pass without criticism.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the Senator is the least among the sinners in that respect, although he is one of them.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will yield to me for just a moment, I hope he will not think that I was alluding to him especially. I was merely taking issue with a particular statement made by the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not say that the Senators were accusing me; I said that from what had been uttered by them such an inference might be drawn by others. I have tried to prevent the building of all of the $37,000,000 battleships that so far have been the subject of legislation by Congress. I think every dollar expended from now on upon a battleship is so much money thrown away. The day of the battleship is gone, long ago. Sir Percy Scott, of the British Admiralty, predicted that the submarine—and this was before the German war—would in active warfare render the battleship obsolete; but we are still appropriating money for them and still building them, while we are neglecting the air, the control of which will be absolutely essential to our national security. We are economizing upon what is obvious as a result of this war and squandering money like drunken sailors upon other things that are either obsolete or unnecessary at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I certainly do.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator desires to consider the question of economy—and I think that question should be uppermost in the minds of all of us—I call his attention to a bill reported out by the Committee on Military Affairs, of which he and I are both members, under which, if enacted into law, there will be about $1,300,000,000 expended next year on our Army—about five times as much as German militarism in the heyday of its glory in peace times cost. If we desire to economize, it seems to me we had better try to bring about economy by stopping the spigot instead of stopping the little leaks that may occur in a bill like this, which involves only about $33,000,000, I believe, in comparison with $1,300,000,000 that is sought by the bill to which I have referred to be appropriated for our Army next year.

Mr. THOMAS. I know that whenever the Army is mentioned, the Senator from Tennessee sees red. He is opposed to it absolutely.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, quite the contrary. That is very unfair.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I withdraw the statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad the Senator does. I believe we should have an Army, but I do not believe we should fasten German militarism upon the people of this country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, we are at one again. I do not believe so either. I am in favor of reducing the actual expenses of the Government in every department to the very lowest point commensurate with the national safety and the national need. I want to see the knife applied as far as we can do it with safety and security to the Army, to the Navy, and to all the other departments, not excepting the Agricultural Department. I know that what I want and what will be done will be as far apart as the poles. I have often had occasion to say that the microscopic, undiscoverable point in national legislation is the point where we should begin to economize. We can not find it. It is not there. No microscope was ever constructed of sufficient enlarging power even to locate it. We know how all of these criticisms are met, and we know the results. In the matter of economy we are apt, as they do in the matter of taxes, to pass it on, and it is passed on in circular form, so that it continues a spiral movement and never gets anywhere.

This is not the time to continue any discussion in regard to the boll weevil. I am sorry that I mentioned the subject, since the mere mention of it created such a tremendous flurry. I do intend to say something when that part of the bill is reached, because I am not convinced that many of the appropriations which this and previous bills have carried have been of that demonstrated usefulness which a continuing appropriation should have, and which experience must justify or else disapprove of.

I regret to see the scientific, experienced, expert employees of the Agricultural Department leave the public service. I think it is a great misfortune. I regret to see the experienced officers of the Navy and of the Army forced out of the Government employment for the same reason—that is to say, that the amount of their compensation is not commensurate with the needs of life. I have never criticized, and I hope I never shall criticize, proper compensation for those employees in the Government service who follow a line of technical work, who have prepared to do it, who are dependent upon the work as their life work, and who can be retained only by giving them a sufficient remuneration to enable them to live. They, however, are suffering from the enormous congestion in all these departments of a superfluity of civil-service employees. They are making vicarious atonement for the policy and practice of the Government in crowding employees into the various departments until they are so congested that the work itself frequently languishes. True economy requires, and ought to receive, scientific treatment; and the number of ordinary employees should be reduced to the very lowest degree commensurate with the public needs. On the other hand, these scientific men, these experts in the various lines of public endeavor, should be continued in the service, notwithstanding the fact that it may result in an immediate temporary increase of expenditures.

I think I have made myself clear upon that branch of the subject.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have no disposition to join in any criticism of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] because of his criticisms of this bill. I am sure that he is entirely conscientious in the position which he takes. But, Mr. President, ever since I have been in this body I have noticed a greater disposition to criticize and pick flaws in the Agricultural bill than is evidenced toward any other appropriation measure that comes before this body. At times I have been very much astonished by the fact that frequently Senators representing agricultural States seem disposed to seize upon every little item of appropriation in the Agricultural bill for the purpose of criticism.

If you will except the river and harbor bill, no bill appropriating money is as much the subject of this sort of captious and frequently unwarranted and unjust criticism as the little bit that we are able to give for the benefit of the farmers of this country.

Everybody knows that outside of the relatively small amounts that we appropriate to aid in the instruction of men who are engaged in agriculture we are not able to legislate in a way directly to help the farmer. There is very little tariff legislation we can enact that will be effective that will directly benefit the farmer. There is a great deal of tariff legislation that we can enact and do enact that seriously injures the farmer; and it does seem to me, in view of the fact that by reason of the limitations under which we act here we are able to do so little for the farming interest of this country—the interest that lies at the very foundation of our prosperity—that Senators ought not to begrudge to the farmers the crumbs that fall from our legislative table.

Mr. President, our tariff bills come up here laden sometimes with thousands of different items intended to encourage and stimulate and develop the industries of this country, and we very frequently discuss only briefly the great and far-reaching schedules of those measures. Through our legislation we are enabled to extend, and we do extend, substantial aid to almost every other industry in this country—direct, positive aid—not by way of instruction but by way of helping to make profitable the other industries of this country. When we come to the farmer, we can not extend the same direct, effectual aid.

What is the situation, Mr. President? We find that every great industry in this country, except that of agriculture, is to-day able to command all the labor that is reasonably required for its prosecution; and yet the men who are engaged in producing the things that we need and upon which we subsist, and who are engaged in producing the raw materials out of which the clothes that we wear are made, can not secure anything like an adequate supply of labor to efficiently carry on their business, and every Senator who is here representing an agricultural State will tell you to-day that the prospects are that the next crop in this country is going to be disappointingly short, because labor is leaving the farm and going where? Going into the other industries of the country. Why? Of course, Mr. President, labor always goes where it can get the biggest wage, and the man who makes the biggest profit can pay and does pay the biggest wage; and it is because the farmers can not afford to pay the same price for labor that the other industries of this country pay that these other industries have all the labor they need and the farmers have less than they need.

Mr. President, I say that we are in danger in this country of overstimulating some channels of the activities of the people of the country. You can so overstimulate by legislation and other processes certain lines of work and industry in this country as to starve the agriculturist of his labor; and when you do that, you strike a blow at the very foundations of our prosperity.

I would not say one word against proper legislation here to develop the industries of this country, but I do warn Senators that we can go so far in artificially stimulating the activities of the people in certain lines that it will recoil upon those who are engaged in other lines. What good will it do us to manufacture all the goods that the world needs at this time if as a result our entire population flocks to the cities and flocks to the factories and flocks to the mines? What shall we gain by making all the goods the world needs at this time if by so doing we find our fields neglected and we are not able to produce the food upon which we subsist and the raw materials out of which clothes are made in this country? I can not conceive of a more disastrous situation than that, especially at a time when, if we can not ourselves produce the foodstuffs that we require, there is no quarter of the world from which we can obtain them at a reasonable price.

I do not mean to inveigh against any and every person who objects to an item in the Agricultural bill; but I am making these remarks in order solemnly to call the attention of the Senate of the United States and the people of the United States to the situation in which the farmers of this country are now placed with reference to labor, due to the fact that labor can find so much more profitable employment in other lines of activity in this country, and to inquire whether it would not be better to do a bit more for the farmer if we can, stimulating him somewhat, if practicable, in his efforts to supply us with the necessary things of life rather than to go too far in artificially stimulating the activities of the people who are engaged in other industries.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from North Carolina has asked a general question, and I would like to reply to him by asking another. Can the Senator suggest any method of legislation, either through the Agricultural appropriation bill or otherwise, that would prevent this exodus from the farm the consequences of which he very justly apprehends; and if so, what would his recommendation be? I am painfully aware of the fact that the farmers of the United States are short in labor, and I greatly fear that as time passes that shortage will increase rather than otherwise. I do not know of any method of legislation, no matter what you do with your Agricultural appropriation bill, that would take care of that.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will recall that I said that there was very little we could do; but what little we can do, let us do.

Mr. THOMAS. What little can we do? Will the Senator mention a thing in this Agricultural appropriation bill that will stop the flow of labor from the farm and reverse the current? If he can, I will vote for it.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I can not mention any specific thing that might be done through the Agricultural appropriation bill. But I can suggest, Mr. President, that gentlemen should not, by their course in the Senate and in the other branch of this Congress, try to strike out of that bill the little that we do provide and are able to give to the farmers.

A great deal has been accomplished in this country in the interest of agriculture, Mr. President, in recent years, through the Agricultural Department. We have advanced wonderfully in our system of cultivation in this country, and as a result of the instruction which that department has given, the information which the department has afforded, the demonstrations which that department has made possible in this country in the way of illustration as to the manner in which crops may be most profitably cultivated, attended, tilled, harvested, housed, and marketed, a great deal has been accomplished in the interest of agriculture. Any man who is acquainted with farming in this country to-day knows that the farms are more productive than they were in the past. I do not know, and I have not said, that we could do anything to at once stop this movement of labor from the farm to the factory and the town. But I have said, Mr. President, and I repeat it, that if there is any chance for us to do anything to further equip and aid the farmer to increase the productiveness of his business, and further aid him to improve his methods of cultivation, we ought to do it, and the relatively small sums that we expend here upon the Agricultural Department in order to better enable that department to furnish helpful and necessary information to the farmers of the country ought not to be begrudged by anybody. The sums here appropriated will carry benefit. This may be all we can do. But, Mr. President, on the other hand, it behooves us to be very careful, in view of the little we can do directly for the farmer, not to overstimulate the other industries of this country and as a consequence further accentuate the unbalanced condition of the people of this country.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, I would just like to state that we are not likely to encourage the young men and the laborers to stay on the farms by discouraging all we can any appropriation or any help to the farmer. One method of helping them will be to withhold unjust criticism.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I merely wish to add to the discussion the reflection that the logic of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] would seem to lead to the proposition that no matter what appears in the Agricultural appropriation bill, it should be accepted by the Senate and enacted into law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to indorse what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has well said about this bill, speaking generally. What gave rise to this flurry in the debate was, I understand, the appropriation concerning the boll weevil. I am very frank to say that we do not have that very dastardly little animal down in my State. We have been fortunate enough in Tennessee not to have this insect; but I happen to know from personal inspection the great ravages it has made in the lands below, in Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, and in other far-southern portions of our country, and it is getting nearer to us all the time. It is an important matter, just as Senators have said. Whole farms have been rendered useless for raising cotton because of it, and it is perfectly right and perfectly natural that an appropriation should be made by the Government to stamp out this evil if it can be stamped out.

Speaking generally about the provisions of this bill, I have always thought that the appropriations made in the Agricultural appropriation bill were, comparatively speaking, almost stingy. Before the conditions of the last three or four years, brought on by the war, my recollection is that the Agricultural appropriation bill carried but five or six millions of dollars, and since the war has come on, when it was necessary to stimulate production all over our land, the appropriations in this bill have been largely increased, and I think the war has taught us that all the money we have spent in the stimulation of production of agricultural products in our land has been money well spent. Indeed, I do not believe that the Congress can spend money for a better purpose, one which will bring a greater return, than money for this purpose.

Several years ago, in making a campaign, I went into every county, I believe, in my State, and it happened to be in the harvest time, and I saw the results of the experimental work that was being carried on by the Department of Agriculture in all those counties in my State. My State is an agricultural State. These experimental agents, agents of the Government, giving instruction, giving lessons to the farmers, and showing them how to make the most out of their farms, how to cultivate the crops that they had, what crops were best suited to the kinds of land, and all their manifold activities, have increased production almost beyond measure. In addition to that, many crops were raised that were not raised before, and in that way production was largely increased by reason of the work of these agents of the Government and of this department.

For these reasons I know of a certainty that this work ought to be fostered. I am not speaking for any particular item of the bill. I never served on the Committee on Agriculture and do not know anything especially about the various items. But I do know that the work generally is a great work, and a work that ought to be encouraged.

The idea of spending $33,000,000 on the most important thing we have in this country, and spending billions on others that are less important to the welfare and happiness of our people, is almost a monstrosity, in my judgment. I think we could well afford to spend much more to enable the farmers of this country to produce more and more each year, and I know that the work of this department has been along that line, and has had that effect for many years past, and we ought to see to it that it is kept up and that the necessary appropriations are given.

There may be some individual instances where misappropriations are made. There may be some individual appropriations that fall short of what is expected. There may be some that we do not get results from. I have not the slightest doubt that we make mistakes about them.

Anyone who is inclined to find fault can unquestionably find that mistakes have been made in the use of some of these appropriations. But, Mr. President, where is the man who is worth anything who has not made mistakes? We all make mistakes. No man gets anywhere unless he does make mistakes. The very word "experiment" shows that mistakes are expected to be made at times. But simply because we do make mistakes, simply because there are errors made, is no reason why we should discontinue this great work, and I feel as if it ought not only to be continued but that we ought to add to it, wherever it is necessary, all along the line.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. A Member of the House from the South met me a few days ago and suggested that what is known as the pink bollworm has entered the cotton territory. Its activities at this time, he said, are confined to one or two counties, but it is apprehended that unless it is checked it will very rapidly spread, probably much more rapidly than did the boll weevil, and that probably it is a more destructive insect than the boll weevil. He said that the bill makes provision for some appropriation for the eradication of that insect, but he made this additional statement, that the Agricultural Department—and I am quoting him because I have not had opportunity personally to investigate the matter—is of the opinion that about the only effectual way of combating that insect is the total destruction of the crop which it attacks; and the Member suggested that if a part of the fund which the commitee proposes to appropriate to combat it were set apart for the compensation of the owners of such crops as had to be destroyed it would be much more effectual.

Of course, I know that in adopting the course this Member suggested we would be entering upon a very dangerous field of legislation; but there are precedents for it. My recollection is that where cattle that are affected with certain virulent diseases have to be killed in order to prevent the spread of the diseases, we make provision for the compensation of the owners of the cattle so slaughtered. That is somewhat on all fours, if not altogether so, with the proposition advanced to me by the Member of the House of whom I have spoken.

I ask the chairman of the committee if that matter has been presented to him, and if any consideration has been given to it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the question of indemnity to farmers where the crop has to be destroyed in eradicating the pink bollworm was not presented to the committee, and it was not discussed. I will say to the Senator, however, that the Senate committee has made a liberal increase in this bill for eradicating the insect known as the pink bollworm. We think it is absolutely necessary that the appropriation should be made.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am very much in favor of such an appropriation.

Mr. GRONNA. It may be considered by some that it is an unnecessary expense; but, after hearing the experts and after hearing the men who had actually seen the work of this insect, the committee were unanimous in recommending that this increased appropriation should be made. I do not think that we can at this time make any allowance or create an indemnity fund to reimburse the farmers.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will not understand me as urging that. I simply wished to call the matter to his attention, and to inquire whether it had been called to his attention by anyone else, and to ask that he would look into it. I think it is worthy of investigation.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator that it is worthy of investigation.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it be true that the Agricultural Department thinks that the course suggested to me by the House Member is the only effective way of eradicating this pest, of course it will be wise public policy to require the destruction of any crop that may be attacked. People are deeply interested in that industry, and if a crop is destroyed, in the interest of the whole industry, the one man whose crop happens to be the victim of this pest ought not to suffer a total loss.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I would remind the chairman of the committee that no claim was really presented covering anything in the way of indemnity to the people who have lost their crops. The matter was mentioned by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], who is a member of the committee. The pink bollworm has made its presence known in Texas and in Louisiana. In Louisiana the State itself and the counties make provision for indemnifying the farmer for loss. In fact, they are encouraging farmers to substitute other crops, with a view to the possible eradication of the pink bollworm. It is supposed to be a more deadly pest than the boll weevil itself.

I might say in behalf of the Department of Agriculture that the appropriation for the current fiscal year, as I recall it, was $586,000. The department felt that it had the work sufficiently in hand to recommend a reduction of $200,000, asking in their estimate, as I recall it, but $386,000 for the next fiscal year. An outbreak in Louisiana constrained them to ask for $586,000 for the next fiscal year as well as for the current year. It turned out that several carloads of seed in the infected locality had been shipped to other communities, and it is desirable and, in fact, necessary, to pursue that seed and, if possible, recover and destroy it. The department has that work in view. It is highly desirable to bring about the complete eradication.

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentlemen who spoke to me about the matter did not suggest a specific appropriation for the purpose, but suggested the wisdom of permitting the department to use a certain portion of the fund that should be appropriated for the purpose of indemnity in case, in its judgment, it would be necessary.

Mr. GORE. I will say that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] suggested that he did not think there would be any necessity for that; that the State and counties and communities were meeting that matter.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. Does the Senator say the State of Louisiana is doing something to suppress this evil?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. I am glad to hear it. This is the first time I have heard in a long time of a State doing anything that might be done by the Federal Government.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that the States cooperate with the Federal Government in a great many activities provided for by the Agricultural appropriation bill. In fact, the destruction of tubercular cattle and the losses resulting from that source are shared by the States and the Federal Government. Of the money appropriated for the eradication of the boll weevil, the States and counties and localities not only put up dollar for dollar, but various localities and organizations contribute much more than is contributed by the Federal Government.

It strikes me that it is not always true that prevention is better than cure, but certainly it is with respect to these pests affecting agriculture. Many of them sometimes pass beyond control. There are certain pests in this country to-day toward which we are establishing what the doctors call a tolerance. We have lost hope of their complete eradication. I might say that the corn borer is one of them. This bill carries an appropriation of half a million dollars to arrest and restrict the corn borer, for the eradication is hopeless. The insect is a calamity. Any appropriation that would bring about the eradication of that pest would be a national economy. It can not be done. It has not yet reached the great corn belt in the Central West, but if it ever reaches that great agricultural empire the losses to this country would be incalculable and would minimize any effort of any appropriation that might have been made to restrict its advance toward that section.

The question was raised a moment ago as to what the General Government could do for the farmers. We realize there is not a great deal the Government can do to help the farmer directly. There are a great many things the Government can avoid doing that would hurt the farmer. The farmers of this country have never been the beneficiaries of special privileges. It must be said to their credit that they have never sought to become the beneficiaries of special privileges. The farmers have been fortunate when they could escape and they will be fortunate when they can escape becoming the victims of those who have been invested with special privileges by the Government. The farmer is one man who has occasion to feel that he is lucky when he gets justice.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the pink-bollworm situation is so critical that the Department of Agriculture will hold a hearing next week in this city on the question of quarantining the country against the States of Louisiana and Texas in an endeavor to arrest the spread of the pink bollworm from those States to other States in the neighborhood.

As Senators well know, the labor shortage and the inclemency of the season make it certain that the cotton crop this year will be small, and if this pink-bollworm pest can not be arrested there is imminent danger of the destruction of a large part of this year's crop. I do not see how we can consistently destroy the plantings of a farmer in arresting this pest without making some kind of remuneration.

The Senator from Oklahoma stated that the State of Louisiana had made provision for property damaged or destroyed through efforts to arrest this pest. I do not know how it is as to Louisiana. I ask the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] if the State of Louisiana has made any appropriation in this respect.

Mr. GAY. I will say to the Senator from Texas that the State of Louisiana has made no appropriation up to this time. The legislature will meet in May, and I understand that legislation will be proposed at that time. Representatives from various cotton States have had a meeting in Louisiana only recently to discuss methods of eradicating the worm. I have a letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture of the State of Louisiana. He says, in part:

> There is only one way of stamping out the pink bollworm, and that is by not planting cotton, but we expect to compensate the parties that are prevented from growing cotton for the next year or two.

That, I believe, will be done by putting a tax upon the cotton producers of 50 cents a bale in order to compensate those planters in the one parish where this bollworm has so far shown for the losses that they will experience from not being able to plant.

So far a very small section of one parish in the State of Louisiana has been affected, and I regret to say that this worm seems to have come from the State of Texas, where it has existed for several years.

Prompt and energetic measures are necessary, and the Government of the United States should be liberal in helping to combat this new menace to the great cotton crop of this country.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Nothing will be done in the way of remuneration in Louisiana until June?

Mr. GAY. Not until the legislature meets in May.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] if he can state the difference between the boll weevil and the pink bollworm? I want to know what the pink bollworm is. We have in our State what the farmers complain of as a pest known as the pink spider.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am not sufficiently versed in scientific matters or in entomology to give the Senator an exact description.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The bollworm is very similar to the corn borer. It bores into the boll before it is matured, destroys the seed before they are matured in the boll, and therefore destroys the life of the fiber and the boll becomes blackened and there is no fiber in it. It is a misnomer to call it the boll weevil. That has the shape of the blue weevil. It attacks the little bud before the flower comes and punctures it and deposits the egg, and the larvæ there destroy the bloom.

The only process by which they have been able to get cotton in the weevil-infested section is by early planting, extraordinary stimulation of the plant by labor and fertilization. If you get a boll a quarter grown or just get it set good, as they call it, you will have that boll come to maturity. The presence of the bollworm means neither bolls nor blooms.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is it not a fact that the pink bollworm is the most destructive cotton pest that has yet appeared?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; it takes a whole crop. It does not leave any boll or any fiber at all.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have brought out the fact that, so far as the State of Louisiana is concerned, no provision has been made for remuneration and can not be made for some months. In Texas the legislature passed a law providing that remuneration might be made, but made no appropriation when it enacted the law. The Texas Legislature does not meet again until next January. Consequently Congress is face to face with a crisis in this matter and should make some provision in order to meet it. I intend, when we reach this particular phase of the bill, to offer an amendment along the line I have indicated.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I want to move an amendment to the pending amendment. I move to substitute the figures "$400,000" for the figures "$302,650." I do that for the reason that the officers who have written me on the subject have stated that heretofore the appropriation for several years was approximately $300,000, and that $300,000 would not do as much work as $400,000 would do now. I do not want to see the work of attempting to eradicate the gypsy moth crippled in any wise. I think it would be mighty poor economy to do it.

We have heard Senators from the South speak of the boll weevil, and I share their concern in the attempts to eradicate that pest, but the boll weevil is to cotton what the gypsy moth is to the northern section of this country, particularly in and about Massachusetts. There is very great danger of having this pest spread; indeed, it has spread. I have called attention to what has been its history in Massachusetts; and it is because the Massachusetts authorities relaxed their efforts to eradicate the pest that it has increased and spread. For that reason I offer the amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio to the committee amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask for a division on the amendment.

The question being put on a division, Mr. POMERENE's amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the committee amendment. Without objection, it will be agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 63, line 4, after the word "Entomology," to strike out "$1,073,840" and insert "$1,232,710," so as to make the clause read:

> Total for Bureau of Entomology, $1,232,710.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Biological Survey," on page 63, line 11, before the word "clerks," to strike out "nine" and insert "ten"; in line 12, before the word "clerks," to strike out "thirteen" and insert "fourteen"; in the same line, after the words "class 1," to strike out "1 clerk, $1,100" and insert "2 clerks, at $1,100 each"; in line 14, before the word "clerks," to strike out "four" and insert "two"; in the same line, after the word "each," to strike out "1 clerk, $840; 1 clerk, $720"; in line 18, after the word "each," to strike out "1 messenger boy, $360"; and in line 19, after the words "in all," to strike out "$68,870" and insert "$68,850," so as to make the clause read:

> Salaries, Bureau of Biological Survey: One biologist, who shall be chief of bureau, $4,000; 1 chief clerk and executive assistant, $1,800; 1 administrative assistant, $2,250; 1 executive assistant, $1,800; 2 clerks, class 4; 4 clerks, class 3; 1 clerk, $1,500; 10 clerks, class 2; 1 clerk, $1,260; 14 clerks, class 1; 2 clerks, at $1,100 each; 1 clerk, $1,080; 3 clerks, at $1,000 each; 2 clerks, at $900 each; 1 preparator, $1,200; 1 preparator, $900; 1 messenger, $720; 1 photographer, $1,300; 1 game warden, $1,200; 2 messenger boys, at $480 each; 1 laborer, $600; 2 charwomen, at $240 each; in all $68,850.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 64, line 11, after the words "United States," to strike out "$34,600" and insert "$39,735," so as to make the clause read:

> For the maintenance of the Montana National Bison range and other reservations and for the maintenance of game introduced into suitable localities on public lands, under supervision of the Biological Survey, including construction of fencing, wardens' quarters, shelters for animals, landings, roads, trails, bridges, ditches, telephone lines, rockwork, bulkheads, and other improvements necessary for the economical administration and protection of the reservations, and for the enforcement of section 84 of the act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," $39,735, of which sum $2,500 may be used for the purchase, capture, and transportation of game for national reservations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 65, line 1, after the word "gophers," to strike out "ground squirrels," so as to read:

For investigating the food habits of North American birds and other animals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry; for investigations, experiments, and demonstrations in connection with rearing fur-bearing animals; for experiments, demonstrations, and cooperation in destroying wolves, coyotes, prairie dogs, gophers.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I wish to be heard on that amendment. I hope the committee amendment will not prevail. I do not think the words "ground squirrels" should be stricken out, and I hope the chairman of the committee will not insist upon the amendment. I had a call the other day from Dr. Fisher, of the Department of Agriculture, and he objected very strongly to the amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Montana that I believe the committee will agree with the Senator that the committee amendment should be rejected.

Mr. MYERS. Then, I have nothing more to say, and I hope the amendment will be defeated. I ask that the question may be put on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 65, line 5, to reduce the appropriation "for investigating the food habits of North American birds and other animals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry," and so forth, from $456,040 to $441,040.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I notice that in this case the Senate committee has reported in favor of striking out "$456,040" and inserting "$441,040." In conversation with me, Dr. Fisher said he hoped the proposed reduction of that item to the sum of $441,040 would not be acceded to. He felt that the larger sum, the sum allowed by the House, should be appropriated, if the item were to provide for extermination of ground squirrels, and I agree with him. I have had a number of communications from Montana in relation to ground squirrels, which are about as bad in Montana as are the wolves, coyotes, prairie dogs, or gophers. In Montana ground squirrels do quite as much damage as any of the other animals or rodents mentioned. I have had a number of petitions and requests from Montana very urgently asking that an item be inserted in the bill in order that it may be particularly devoted to exterminating ground squirrels. Now that we have retained the words "ground squirrels" in the bill, naturally the item calls for more with ground squirrels in than it would with ground squirrels out. I hope the larger sum may be allowed.

I think the excess allowed by the House over that recommended by the Senate committee very reasonable. I am sure there is need for the larger sum.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I understand the matter, with the words "ground squirrels" included in the bill $15,000 were proposed to be appropriated by the other House for their extermination; and $15,000 having been spent in the past, that amount will be required under this appropriation if the item in regard to destroying ground squirrels is restored. What Dr. Fisher told me was that the $456,040 which the House had appropriated should be restored. When the Senate committee struck out the words "ground squirrels" they deducted $15,000 from the House appropriation because of the fact that $15,000 was to be spent for that purpose.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is correct. There was a $15,000 reduction proposed which Dr. Fisher opposed, and I am in accord with him. Parties in Montana, too, have written me to the same effect. I ask that the committee amendment be rejected and that the figures be restored to the amount fixed by the House.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I only speak of the matter as one of the members of the committee. As I recall, a specific lump sum was appropriated for the eradication of these various pests, but there was no itemized or specific sum allowed the department and included in this appropriation for the extermination of ground squirrels. So I do not believe that the restoration of the ground-squirrel item in any way affects the total.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if we are going to restore the item, it will be necessary to have some kind of an appropriation to enable the work to be done. I know that the amount that was assigned in the last appropriation bill for the extermination of ground squirrels was $15,000, and I know also that if that work were provided for it was the intention of the department to assign $15,000 to it during the fiscal year. Fifteen thousand dollars were taken off the amount that the House appropriated; so that if the department is called upon to do the work, then it will be necessary to restore the $15,000.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Utah is undoubtedly correct about that. I hope the amount fixed by the House may be granted and urge that the committee amendment be not adopted.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] correctly states the conditions. No one who appeared before the Senate Committee on Agriculture made any objection to striking out any provision in regard to particular pests or rodents or whatever they may be called. It was suggested that we ought to strike out the item in regard to gophers. The whole general scheme was discussed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I expect to leave to-night for home, and for that reason I have come in somewhat out of order.

I wish to say in connection with the pink bollworm problem that it threatens the cotton production of the United States, and, as a consequence, indirecly the cotton industry of the world, more than anything that has ever menaced us. The Mexican boll weevil, as bad as it has been, has been child's play in comparison with it, and yet the Mexican boll weevil has perhaps cut the cotton crop down, despite the immense motives for increased production, one-third of what it otherwise would have been, and has increased the price to a very great extent.

All over the South numberless plantations have been turned from cotton farms into stock farms; numbers of acres of land have been taken out of cultivation of cotton and put into pasturage. I for one have had that experience with my own home place; and throughout a good part of southern Mississippi and southern Louisiana and Texas the production per plantation, although not the production per acre, has been cut down half. We have managed to keep up the production per acre by reducing the acreage, intensifying the cultivation, and hurrying up the crop so as to get it fruited and bearing before the boll weevil was ready to depredate upon the plant. Now, the pink bollworm, which is another curse coming up from Mexico, is infinitely worse than the Mexican boll weevil and will do infinitely more harm unless it can be almost immediately checked.

Mr. President, I think you know, as I think every Member of the Senate knows, that I have very seldom spoken on any subject from the standpoint of a personal or a class interest. I do not regard this as a personal or class matter because it does not affect the man who raises cotton alone but it affects the man who buys cotton to weave into cloth, and it affects the man who buys the cloth to clothe himself and his children. There could not be any greater world calamity than a permanently high price for cotton goods, and there will be not only a permanently high price for cotton goods but we will have profiteering added, so long as there is an underproduction of cotton owing to any natural calamity like this not to be controlled by the farmer himself.

I am very much in favor of every possible form of economy. I have been thoroughly disgusted with the multiplicity of the demands from every class and quarter for increased appropriations out of the United States Treasury. Every industry, every class, every form of patriotism, almost, is seeking to be capitalized and to put its hands into the Treasury. It is, therefore, a little bit out of keeping with my usual thought to ask an increased appropriation upon any subject, and I would not do so but for the fact that this is so important to the main foreign export business of the United States. Cotton gives us and maintains our balance of trade in normal times, and America's strength in the industrial world very largely grows not only out of the raw cotton which she produces but out of the manufactured product which she makes nearer the fields, with less freight charge, and therefore can, in competition with other countries, sell at lower prices, provided it is a high enough quality of goods.

So it would be a national calamity not to remember in this connection the old adage that "a stitch in time saves nine"; and if we should be a little penny-wise and pound-foolish with regard to this pink bollworm now, we might regret it very much, not only in the cotton fields of the South but in the cotton mills of New England and everywhere else, and in the homes of the people as well, because ultimately, of course, the father of the family must pay for the finished product that started in the field and was concluded in the factory.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator that it is a very important matter, and I want to say that the Senate committee increased the appropriation for the eradication of the pink bollworm from $288,560 to $588,560. In other words, we increased it $300,000, in round numbers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Over the amount estimated?

Mr. GRONNA. Over the amount proposed by the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have been necessarily compelled to be ignorant of some of the details of the pending appropriation bill, but I had understood that the proposition upon the part of the committee was not to give what the House had given.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senate committee increased it $300,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to say that much, at any rate, about the importance of it all; and if that is enough, then it is enough, of course.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I want to say that the question now is whether any provision is to be made to remunerate the owners of property damaged and destroyed in eliminating the pest. That is the question we have to face now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have taken it for granted that if one of the suggested methods of fighting the pest was adopted, a part of the money appropriated would be devoted to the indemnification of the men who suffered by it. Down in Texas, along the border, it may be necessary to fix a sort of a quarantine line and to prevent the cultivation of cotton for a year or two above a certain line. If that is done, undoubtedly some reckoning ought to be made of the losses of those people while they are suffering from the lack of employment of their land and of their labor. There ought to be some provision made in the bill whereby the amount appropriated may be so divided as to indemnify losses that necessarily grow out of a quarantine land campaign against the worm.

We pray that his friends and loved ones may be strengthened and upheld by Thy loving arm in this hour of grief, that we may all be prepared, so that when the call comes we may answer, "Here am I, Lord; do as Thou wilt, for I am Thy child, erring, yet loving, grateful." PERSONAL EXPLANATION—TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

On the 19th of this month there was printed in the Omaha World-Herald a Washington dispatch, sent by the correspondent of that paper, giving a review of the proceedings in the Senate of the day before, the 18th of March. That was the day when the Senate adopted a motion to lay on the table the Egyptian reservation to the treaty of peace with Germany and the Irish reservation which was pending as an amendment to that reservation, and also the Korean reservation which was pending as an amendment to the Irish reservation.

I will not read all of this article, because there is only a small portion of it which bears directly on the point to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate. It is an article headed "Republicans unmask upon Ireland issue." The object of the correspondent in the article is to show that the Republicans were opposed to the Irish reservation and that the Democrats were in favor of it. In the course of the article the language is used which I shall read. I pause here to say that when I decided to call the attention of the Senate to this matter I telephoned to the office of my colleague in order that he might be present, but I learned that he is out of the city and probably will not be back for several days. I quote this from the article:

Senator HITCHCOCK, Democratic leader, voted with those opposed to administering the knockout blow to the Irish cause. Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska, voted the same way his colleague did, but Senator NORRIS went to Senator SHIELDS Tuesday and tried to get him to withdraw the resolution, because it might "put somebody in the hole."

Senator SHIELDS, however, declined to take this free advice. He wanted to have noses counted, and to have the world know what Senators had been "spoofing" all along in their pretended friendship for Ireland.

This article, Mr. President, in so far as it says that I either directly or indirectly suggested to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] that I did not want to put somebody in a hole, or that I wanted him to withdraw his pending amendment because it would put somebody in a hole, is absolutely and entirely false, without any foundation whatever.

The Omaha World-Herald is a daily newspaper printed in Omaha. It is owned, published, and edited by my colleague, the senior Senator from Nebraska, GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK. The Omaha correspondent of that paper is Earl B. Gaddis, who holds a position by virtue of the appointment of my colleague that gives him admission to the floor of the Senate, and he draws a salary from the taxpayers of the United States. There are men and there are newspapers who would rather tell a lie than the truth if the same thing could be accomplished. Mr. Gaddis is one of those men, and he is working for one of those newspapers. In the community where he is best known his uncorroborated sworn testimony would not be taken even as prima facie evidence of a fact.

It might be well, Mr. President, for me to review just briefly the parliamentary situation which existed at the time that this story in the Omaha World-Herald undertakes to describe conditions. The correspondent makes no reference to anything except that an Irish reservation was pending, which, as Senators know, at that time was not the true situation.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] had offered a reservation to the treaty in regard to Egypt. To this the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] offered an amendment that in effect added a reservation in regard to Ireland. To this amendment the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] offered a motion that in effect added a reservation by way of an amendment regarding Korea. The Senate was in that parliamentary situation when I went to see the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and we had a conference as to what was the best proceeding to attempt in order to secure the adoption of the Irish reservation. I told the Senator from Tennessee that I was in favor of every one of the three propositions which were pending; that I would vote for them singly or collectively; but that I believed it was unwise to couple them together; that I thought they ought to be voted on as separate propositions. What I feared was that some one would make a motion to lay on the table the original proposition, which was the Egyptian reservation, and that Senators who were opposed to any one of the three would vote for that motion, and it would table the whole thing, because if we tabled the original proposition it would take with it the amendments that were pending. And, Mr. President, that is just exactly what happened.

To demonstrate further that I was right in my judgment, the next day, on the 19th of March, the Irish reservation was offered and voted on as a separate proposition, and, as the Senate and the country know, it was adopted not only in Committee of the Whole but also in the Senate on two different roll calls.

Mr. President, a newspaper or a writer has the right to draw any conclusion it or he may see proper from the official action of any Senator or other public officer, from his vote, from what he says, and from what he does, but no one has a moral right to tell a lie, and then base his conclusion on his own falsehood.

I showed this clipping to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. He would have been here this morning but he had to leave last night for his home, to be gone several days; but before he went away he wrote me a letter which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
March 24, 1920.

Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have read the clipping from the World-Herald of Omaha, which you sent me, and remember the conversation between us upon the Egyptian and Irish reservations very distinctly.

We were discussing the policy of joining the two reservations, and you approached me solely in the interest of both of them.

You suggested that it might be best to separate them as some would support one and might not support the other.

I was of a different opinion, and thought it best to keep them together.

You were, as you expressly stated, in favor of the Egyptian reservation, offered by Senator OWEN, and the Irish reservation, offered by me, and that you would support them both, jointly or separately, and your suggestion was as to the best policy to pursue in the matter.

Yours, truly,

JOHN K. SHIELDS.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it does not seem to me to be quite fair that a Member of the Senate owning a newspaper should appoint as the Washington correspondent of that newspaper a man whom he then puts on the pay roll of the United States and permits him to draw a salary from the taxpayers of the country. That is particularly true when the position to which he appoints him gives him access to the floor of the Senate, where other correspondents are denied admission. It is, in my judgment, indirectly a violation of the rules of the Senate. Such a correspondent ought to be stricken from the pay rolls, and the Senator who brings about such a condition deserves, in my humble opinion, the censure not only of the Senate but of the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, as regards the position of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] upon the so-called Irish reservation, no man who has attended the sessions of the Senate as regularly as I have done will have any doubt that he is one of the Members of this body who supported sincerely and conscientiously the Egyptian and the Irish and the Korean reservations. Hence I am sure that no explanation is necessary to establish that fact, but inasmuch as this subject has been again brought up, I shall reemphasize the fact that both the Irish reservation and the resolution preceding it were mere demagogy. They never should have entered into the discussions of the treaty. They were inspired by political considerations, a fact for which both sides of the Chamber are responsible and of which both sides should be ashamed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, any man has a right in the Senate or out of it to draw any conclusion he sees fit. I would defend a Senator or a newspaper or a writer for doing that, even though I did not agree with the conclusions reached, even though I thought the conclusions wrong or even malicious; but I want to say here and now that there never was a time while the treaty was pending when the Irish reservation was under consideration that I did not believe in it; that I did not believe it was right. I am not ashamed for having defended it; I am not ashamed of having voted for it; I should do so again under similar circumstances; but I am not going to question any other Senator's motives. I am willing to concede that, whether he voted for it or against it, he was moved by the highest and the noblest of motives; but no matter whether there were some demagogues or no demagogues or all demagogues, there is not any man, either in the Senate or out of it, who has any right to accuse anybody else of occupying a false position, to tell a lie about him, and thus to put him in a false light.

I have no political capital to make; I have no personal gain to secure here or elsewhere. There is nothing that I could gain by voting for a reservation on the treaty or against a reservation on the treaty. There is no politics in it for me anywhere.

I know those of us who wanted to put reservations on the treaty were accused of insulting Great Britain. It was said, "You are doing things here that are insulting to Great Britain." We were even told, or almost told, that we were saved from destruction by Great Britain. I know I entertain no bad feeling against Englishmen or against the English Government. I think probably that when the criticism was made it had more application to me than to anyone else, because I went more into detail as to the promises, particularly on the Egyptian proposition, that England had made than did any other Senator. I thought England broke them, and I told about it; I told what I believed to be the truth, and it stands here uncontradicted up to this hour. I defy any man to contradict any of the statements I made in that regard. I do not criticize the man who does not agree with me; but I am not one of those who believe that we owe everything which we have to Great Britain. I presume there are Senators who think that we would have lost the Civil War if it had not been for Great Britain; that we would have lost the War of 1812 if it had not been for Great Britain. During that war we know how Great Britain defended the Capital here, and we know how she defended our fathers in the Revolutionary War. So she has always been helping us and always been saving us.

I have not had in this treaty fight, as I said a while ago, anything to gain. I think I can express my position by what the darky said when he was talking to his girl. He said, "I hain't got nothin'; I never had nothin'; and I don't want nothin'." That is the way with me, politically. We shall all have to stand or fall upon the record we make. If we make a conscientious record, then we shall get some satisfaction out of it, even though we fall after we have made it. That may be and probably will be my fate. I am ready to accept it at any time and take the consequences. I do not have very long to live, but during that time I am going to live at peace with my own conscience, whatever may be the consequences.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I dislike very much to interrupt the Senator when he is speaking to a question of personal privilege, but, if he will permit me, I wish to say that the Senator from Nebraska spoke to me and stated practically what the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] stated in his letter with reference to the vote on the Irish question and on the Egyptian question and on the Korean question.

I simply want to say to the Senator from Nebraska and the Senate that during the war, when everyone was excited, there was an Associated Press dispatch sent out charging me with voting against the appropriation of $640,000,000 for the Air Service. The RECORD will show there was no record vote on it; that there was not a dissenting voice against that appropriation bill. Yet I was criticized most severely by my constituents for having voted against it. I did not speak of it in the Senate; but I agree with the Senator from Nebraska that it is unjust for any newspaper correspondent or anyone else to tell a malicious, willful lie about public servants or anyone else.

If the Senator from Nebraska will pardon me further, I find no fault with any Senator construing a vote in any way he pleases; but, so far as I am personally concerned, the votes which I cast upon the question of liberating subject nations and according to them the right of self-determination were cast conscientiously and from a sense of duty. I voted for the amendment prepared by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] with reference to Korea; I voted for the reservation in behalf of the Egyptians, and while it might be charged that I voted for the Irish reservation in order to gain votes from the Irish, I can not possibly be charged with voting for the Egyptian reservation with the motive of gaining votes, because, so far as I know, there are no Egyptians in my State who enjoy the privilege of voting.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not yet yielded the floor; but I will be through in just a moment, if the Senator will allow me to proceed.

Mr. WARREN. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from North Dakota has reminded me of one matter to which I omitted to refer. It is said that Senators who voted for the Irish reservation were playing politics and were demagogues because there are some Irish voters.

If I desired to reciprocate in kind, I would say something that I never have said or will say—that probably those who voted the other way were demagogues, because they had the English vote in mind, because they realized the enormous financial power of Great Britain and her financial allies scattered all over the United States. But, Mr. President, if I am a demagogue because I vote for the Irish reservation in order to get the Irish vote, what am I when I vote for the Egyptian reservation? I devoted a considerable amount of time to Korea in connection with the discussion of the treaty, probably more time than any other Senator gave to that subject, and I also devoted a great deal of time to Egypt. I did that before the Irish reservation came up. I might answer those who say "You wanted to get the Irish vote" that I do not need the Irish vote, because, on the same theory, when I raised my weak voice in behalf of downtrodden Korea I was a demagogue and I got the Korean vote, and when I did what I could to save Shantung for China I was a demagogue playing for the Chinese vote, and when I came as well as I could to the rescue of Egypt, I was playing politics and trying to get the Egyptian vote and losing the English vote in the meantime, probably. So, Mr. President, I am solid with the Korean vote; I am solid with the Egyptian vote; I am solid with the Chinese vote; and what in the world do I want with the Irish vote?

STORAGE OF ARMY SUPPLIES.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, my attention has been called to an article appearing in the Brooklyn Daily Eagle of Thursday, March 18. The headline of this article is:

Big Army stores, prey of storms, piling up losses. Thousands of dollars daily depreciation due to storage out of doors.

In this connection recently I received a letter from a reputable business concern in New York, calling my attention to this particular subject. The gentleman who wrote me, among other things, stated:

We recently sent one of our buyers to Governors Island—

Which, as Senators know, is an Army post located on an island in the harbor of New York—to examine some of this merchandise, and the report received is astonishing. This buyer reports, and from previous information we believe it can be easily confirmed, that merchandise at Governors Island has been allowed to be exposed to the elements until it is absolutely useless. The waste of money because of this must be stupendous, for not only are the small goods neglected this way, but such items as automobiles are left exposed to the elements, with their hoods raised, and are utterly ruined.

Mr. President, the Brooklyn Eagle evidently sent one of their correspondents to examine into conditions at Governors Island, for, among other things, they say in this article:

A visit to the island revealed an enormous amount of "imperishable" material and equipment in varying stages of deterioration piled about; some covered with pieced-together burlap or canvas; much without any pretense of protection. All had the appearance of much-used merchandise, yet it all is absolutely new, or at least unused, according to the authorities.

GARBAGE CANS NOT UP TO SAMPLE.

In several towering pyramids there are 100,000 garbage or ash cans, for which there is little market even at the phenomenally modest price of $3 each, at which they are offered. The market price for these cans is about $6 each. Many buyers who have taken a "flyer" in them because of the low price, quoted on a fair-looking sample, have repudiated the deal on delivery because the cans did not measure up to the sample.

However, it is very difficult to get any of these buyers to comment on the situation. They say frankly that it would be a ruinous business policy for them to criticize the methods of so good a customer or source of supply as the Government, and that they prefer simply to pocket their losses and hope for better luck next time; for it is a fact that much of the material being offered by the Government makes an attractive purchase for dealers and speculators.

This article goes on to indicate that at Governors Island, N. Y., there are vast quantities of property purchased by the United States Government for war purposes which has been taken out of the storehouses and lying there exposed to the elements and going to ruin.

I have called this matter to the attention of the War Department. It has been called to the attention of all the people in New York City by the newspapers, and I bring it to the attention of the Senate, and particularly to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, in the hope that they may summon before them the officials of the War Department and insist that steps be taken to preserve this property, which has been paid for by the money derived from the taxes levied upon the people.

If we expect to have a contented citizenry, struggling as they are under oppressive burdens, it is important that the officials of the Government should see to it that their property is not squandered in so outrageous a manner as this article indicates.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 12610) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 488) thereon. I wish to say that I shall endeavor to call up the bill immediately following the consideration of the Agricultural bill, which is now before the Senate, and of the Post Office bill, provided that bill follows the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NUGENT:

A bill (S. 4129) to add certain lands to the Boise National Forest, Idaho; and

A bill (S. 4130) for the relief of Lyn Lundquist; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. NUGENT (for Mr. KING):

A bill (S. 4131) to appropriate funds for the purchase of Zion National Park stamp-canceling dies; to the Committee on Appropriations.

A bill (S. 4132) granting an increase of pension to Richard Burnside (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 4133) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational education, to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries, to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects, and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditures," approved February 23, 1917; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

AMENDMENT TO NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept from King County, Wash., a certain tract of land containing 250 acres, more or less, at Sand Point, for use as an aviation base, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

ACTIONS FOR DEATH ON THE HIGH SEAS.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I send to the desk a concurrent resolution, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 25) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (S. 2085) relating to the maintenance of actions for death on the high seas and other navigable waters the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out, on page 2, line 15 of the engrossed bill, the word "fault" and insert "default" in lieu thereof.

WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Washington Post of this morning quotes me as saying yesterday:

Congress has no constitutional power to pass over the President's veto a joint resolution declaring a state of peace between the United States and Germany.

I am not conscious of having made any such statement.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR MARTIN.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate designate Saturday, April 10, for the delivery of eulogies upon my late colleague, Senator THOMAS S. MARTIN, of Virginia.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in an effort to effect economy in the use of Government printing, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing I directed that an inquiry be made as to publications and other printed matter which various governmental agencies are sending to each Senator's office and each Representative's office. I requested that the publications that were of no use whatever to the Congressman or Senator be held for one week, and that reports be made to me, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, as to those publications that are of no use to the Senator or Congressman.

In answer to that letter, I wish to say that I have here upon my desk a bundle of governmental publications that were sent to one Senator's office for one week that he desires not to be sent to him hereafter. These are only samples of the publications that go to the 435 Congressmen and the 96 Senators. These publications go into the wastebasket, and are sold for about 60 cents a hundred pounds as waste paper.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask to what subjects those publications relate?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the list prepared, but they are copies of hearings, they are reports of departments, they are the daily statements of the United States Treasury that we also find here upon our desks every morning. They are all sorts of articles that are published in Government publications, that are frequently duplicated in the annual reports made by the departments. This is only one evidence of the wicked waste of public money that the Joint Committee on Printing is trying to eliminate.

I wish to say, in this connection, that we have already stopped 106 governmental publications. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] asks me if I have a list of those. I will say to the Senator that I am going to make a full and complete report just as soon as we are through with the work; but thousands and tens of thousands of tons of paper are being used for no good purpose, and absorbs appropriations that were made to benefit the people in general.

I desire at this time to thank the Senators and also the Members of Congress who have responded to the letter, and the committee will segregate them and find out just how many there are that should be discontinued.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may say just a word, I realize that there are a good many of these publications that perhaps are worthless; but, on the other hand, because a publication may not be of any particular interest to my constituents in my own State, it does not necessarily follow that it is not of interest to people living in Florida or in Louisiana or in California or in some other State where the industries are entirely different from those in my State.

Mr. SMOOT. Those referred to by the Senator are public documents. The ones I have referred to are mostly assorted circulars and publications. All I want to learn is how many of them are of no use whatever, and then we can stop at least those that go to the Senators and to the Congressmen.

MONTANANS KILLED IN WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I crave the indulgence of the Senate for a minute. I have here a brief clipping from the Helena (Mont.) Independent, embodying an Associated Press dispatch of a recent date, which says:

The final report of the War Department on casualties shows that Montana exceeded every State and Territory in the Union in the percentage of battle deaths.

There were 681 Montanans either killed in action or died of wounds in France. This does not include marines attached to the Army. As Montana furnished 39,511 men to the Army, the percentage of battle deaths was 17.2 to the thousand. Pennsylvania, with a loss of 17 men in every thousand, was the second State. North Dakota, with 16.9 to the thousand, was third.

I am glad to give publicity here to this additional tribute to Montana for the splendid work she did for our country during the war with Germany.

AMNESTY TO PRISONERS (S. DOC. NO. 249, PART 2).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a further communication from the Secretary of State replying to the resolution of the Senate, dated January 13, 1920 (No. 278), requesting that it be furnished with information showing what, if anything, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium, or either of these Governments, have done, through legislative or executive proclamation, or otherwise, looking to the granting of amnesty to military, political, or other prisoners since the signing of the armistice, November 11, 1918.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
24 March, 1920.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I think messages from the President are usually printed. I ask that this message be printed. It is part of a report which has heretofore been made, which was ordered printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that, under the rule, the message and accompanying papers will be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The pending amendment is on page 65, line 5, in the total of the item for investigating the food habits of North American birds, and so forth.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I find upon closer examination that it was stated in the estimates that $15,000 would be used for the eradication of ground squirrels; and as the Senate amendment striking out the provision for ground squirrels has been rejected, I ask that the Senate amendment with reference to this appropriation be also rejected.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, do I understand the request of the Senator from North Dakota to be that the amount be restored to that fixed by the House?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. I thank the Senator. I am glad to understand it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the entire phrase could be improved by eliminating from it the specification of different animals, so that it would apply to "animals injurious to agriculture, horticulture, forestry," and so forth.

The enumeration of a certain class or classes of animals would naturally limit the expenditure of the appropriations to those and include no others. Other animals would fall within the general basket clause, which are "animals injurious to agriculture," and so on. At the same time, the principal expenditure would be upon the enumerated animals rather than upon those which might fall in the general clause. Of course, there is no danger of the extermination of any of these breeds, because that would end the occupation of those Federal employees who are to kill them off at so much per day. I think, therefore, that if the clause could be so changed as to prevent the enumeration it would help conditions very materially.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. That question has been discussed several times in the Senate, and I have always thought the position taken now by the Senator from Colorado is the correct one. The only excuse I have ever heard for the enumeration of the different animals was that in making up the estimate the committee in the past have asked, "What is the money going to be spent for, and where is it to be spent?" Some animal in some other part of the country, which was not taken care of under the original appropriation, was inserted by motion on the floor of the Senate, and then each year the estimate carried the amount of money that was to be expended upon each of the animals named. That is the excuse of naming the animals; but I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. THOMAS. If my recollection serves me aright, this appropriation, first made about four years ago, was aimed at wolves and coyotes. Some Senator then thought that some of the money should be expended in his State, and he probably suggested prairie dogs. Then it occurred to another that he should get some of it for his State, and suggested gophers; and still another ground squirrels. So the process of enumeration has expanded as the supposed need for the local expenditure of the appropriation became manifest.

Mr. MYERS. Is the Senator objecting to the enumeration in the first line on page 65?

Mr. THOMAS. I think it would be better to eliminate that enumeration.

Mr. MYERS. I hardly think it would be better to do that, because by enumerating them it suggests the animals, rodents, and so on, which are the most destructive, to which most of this appropriation should be devoted.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, and the destructive propensities of other animals may become manifest, and then it might occur to some one that the number of employees should be increased by extending the enumeration. I think, therefore, that the general clause is much better. I shall not make a motion; I know it would be rejected. The appropriation will be expended also, but a similar one will follow next year, for the animals will not be exterminated.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota when he expects to have a vote on what is generally known as the free-seed proposition?

Mr. GRONNA. I do not know. We hope to get through with the bill this afternoon.

Mr. KENYON. I was anxious to have an opportunity to vote against the free-seed proposition, as I have always done before; but I have to leave the city to-night, and I was wondering whether there would be a vote to-day.

Mr. GRONNA. I hope we may be able to finish the bill this afternoon.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 16, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$713,300" and insert "$703,435," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $703,435.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the clerks at the desk will be authorized to change the totals to conform to amendments made.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 17, after the word "Survey," to strike out "$782,170" and insert "$772,285," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Division of Publications, $397,050.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Crop Estimates," on page 71, line 23, before the word "clerks," where it occurs the first time, to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "fifty"; in the same line, before the word "clerks," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "nineteen" and insert "nine"; in line 24, before the word "one," to strike out "24 clerks, at $900 each"; in the same line, after the words "1 messenger," to strike out "$840" and insert "$900"; on page 72, line 1, before the word "each," to strike out "$660" and insert "$720"; in the same line, after the word "boy," to strike out "$480" and insert "$600"; and in line 3, after the words "in all," to strike out "$129,300" and insert "$129,260," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, Bureau of Crop Estimates: One statistician, who shall be chief of bureau, $4,000; 1 chief clerk, $1,800; 6 clerks, class 4; 9 clerks, class 3; 15 clerks, class 2; 1 clerk, $1,300; 50 clerks, class 1; 9 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 messenger, $900; 3 messengers or laborers, at $720 each; 3 messenger boys, at $720 each; 1 messenger boy, $600; 1 charwoman, $540; 1 charwoman, $360; 1 charwoman, $240; in all, $129,260.

Mr. ROMERENE. The Senator from North Dakota, who is in charge of the bill, made some explanation the other day as to the reason for the increases in the numbers of the clerks provided for in the earlier part of the bill. Does that same rule apply to the changes in this paragraph?

Mr. GRONNA. Throughout the entire bill, I will say to the Senator. It reduces the number 192 in the various bureaus.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, line 4, under the heading "General expenses, Bureau of Crop Estimates," to insert "and other Federal, State, and local agencies."

Mr. GAY. I ask that this and the following amendments to line 20 may go over for the time being. I understand that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] has some amendments to propose, and he is not here at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the amendments going over?

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator means that all the items under the Bureau of Crop Estimates shall go over?

Mr. GAY. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The amendment that was proposed yesterday by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] is to strike out, on line 18, page 72, "$168,076" and to insert "$370,000." There was also another amendment, touching the total. I know the Senator from Kansas is interested in these items.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, as chairman of the committee I certainly want the Senator from Kansas, who is a member of the committee, to say what he cares to say with reference to this appropriation. I will say, however, that, speaking for myself, instead of increasing the appropriation for the Bureau of Crop Estimates, I feel that it ought to be decreased. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] this morning called attention to a number of periodicals which were sent to him unopened. I received this morning quite a number of the market reports issued by the department, sent to me by the Secretary of the Philadelphia Produce Exchange, Samuel S. Daniels. He states in his letter that it is a matter of waste. I also received a letter from the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with reference to this kind of work, calling my attention to the fact that we ought to begin to economize and to do away with some of these useless, wasteful expenditures. I am simply making this statement to show that there is a reason for cutting down some of these appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Mississippi——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, all in the world that I am doing is just to ask, as a courtesy to the Senator from Kansas, that it go over. I am not asking for any action to be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the item relating to the general expenses of the Bureau of Crop Estimates will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed on page 72, line 21.

The next amendment was under the subhead "Library, Department of Agriculture," on page 72, line 23, after "$2,000," to insert "1 clerk, class 4"; line 24, before the words "class 3," to strike out "1 clerk" and insert "2 clerks"; in the same line, after the words "class 3," to insert "1 clerk, $1,440"; in line 25, before the words "class 2," to strike out "1 clerk" and insert "2 clerks"; on page 73, line 2, before the words "1 messenger," to strike out "6 clerks, at $900 each; 1 clerk, at $840," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, Library, Department of Agriculture: One librarian, $2,000; 1 clerk, class 4; 2 clerks, class 3; 1 clerk, $1,440; 2 clerks, class 2; 6 clerks, class 1; 3 clerks, at $1,080 each; 3 clerks, at $1,020 each; 4 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 messenger, $720; 1 messenger boy, $660; 3 messenger boys, at $600 each; 2 charwomen, at $480 each; in all, $32,880.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 73, line 11, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$18,000" and insert "$22,000," so as to make the clause read:

General expenses, Library: For books of reference, law books, technical and scientific books, papers, and periodicals, and for expenses incurred in completing imperfect series; for the employment of additional assistants in the city of Washington and elsewhere; for official traveling expenses, and for library fixtures, library cards, supplies, and for all other necessary expenses, $22,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge what amount for general expenses of the library of the Department of Agriculture was carried in the last appropriation act?

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator has reference to the general expenses for the library?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the general expenses for the library. The House gave $18,000 and the Senate committee has raised it to $22,000.

Mr. GRONNA. Eighteen thousand dollars is carried in the present law. The department estimated for $26,200 and the House allowed $18,000, the same as the amount carried in the present law. The Senate committee increased it to $22,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That is as I thought it was, but is there any real reason why the appropriation should be increased above the existing law? I think we ought not to give additional appropriations for "papers and periodicals, and for expenses incurred in completing imperfect series," and so forth. If we are going to economize in this bill at all, I very much prefer to begin to economize under the general expenses of the departments than I would where the appropriation affects the farm direct and where the result of the investigation means an advantage to the farmer himself. I am frank to say that I think the House was right in what has been done, in not increasing the appropriation at this particular time.

Mr. GRONNA. May I reply to the Senator?

Mr. SMOOT. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to read from the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture:

The Senate committee has increased the item for general expenses of the department library by $4,000, which will, in a measure, enable the library to meet most urgent needs. From this fund are purchased the books and periodicals for the use of the department in Washington. These reference books are absolutely essential in the investigations of the department.

The letter is rather long. I will say to the Senator that is the only justification for the increase. They say the books are absolutely essential.

Mr. SMOOT. We have, of course, the Congressional Library in Washington and everything is to be found there. I am perfectly willing to maintain the present library of any of the departments outside of the Congressional Library, but I wish to say to the Senator that there is a tendency in every one of the bureaus and divisions of the Government to build up a library for the bureau itself. It is a duplication of books that can not be defended. The Committee on Appropriations began last year to cut out such appropriations for the purchase of additional books. I think it ought to be done. If it is not done there is no limit to the extent to which we will have a library in every department of the Government as well as a library in every bureau. I believe that it would be proper to leave the appropriation just as it was last year, if not to decrease it.

Mr. GRONNA. I realize that there is a great deal of force in what the Senator says, but the department made such an urgent plea for $4,000 in addition to what the House appropriated that the committee was unanimous in allowing it. If the Senator will allow it to go in, I am sure we will give it due consideration before it is disposed of in conference.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to call for a vote upon it, but I predict now that the $4,000 will be spent for the employment of additional assistants in the city of Washington. That is what the money will be spent for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 73, line 12, after the word "Library," to strike out "$50,880" and insert "$54,880," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Library, $54,880.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 13, on page 74, the last paragraph read, being as follows:

Rent of buildings, Department of Agriculture: For rent of buildings and parts of buildings in the District of Columbia, for use of the various bureaus, divisions, and offices of the Department of Agriculture, $164,666: Provided, That only such part of this sum shall be available to pay rent for space which can not be furnished by the Public Buildings Commission in Government buildings located in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMOOT. Can the Senator from North Dakota tell me offhand what part of the sum of $164,666 is available to pay rent for space which can not be furnished by the Public Buildings Commission in Government buildings located in the District of Columbia?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that this is a matter which came from the House, and it was not contested in the Senate committee. Of course, the estimates will give the full explanation of it. I know it is important, and I am glad the Senator has called attention to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I am going to ask the Senator to allow it to go over for the present.

Mr. GRONNA. There is no objection to that course.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason why I have made the request is that the Department of Agriculture has not been satisfied with the space assigned it by the Public Buildings Commission allowing so much space to each employee. I think to-day that every employee in that department has allotted a space of at least 70 square feet, and more is asked for. This means, of course, that they are going to use part of the $164,666 to rent additional space in the District of Columbia. I would like, before it is finally passed upon, to get word from the department as to what part of this appropriation of $164,666 they intend to use for the renting of space in the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter will be passed over.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I am interested in agriculture, and also very deeply interested in economy. Just for the information of the Senate, I desire to say that I have a paper here to which I wish to call the attention of the Senators, so that they may know that we are making no mistake in trying to extinguish the boll weevil. I never saw that insect except one in a bottle, but recently he has been making an advance on our State. Just this last season he got into the State of South Carolina, in a few counties, and for the information of the Senate I will read some figures from this statement.

This is a bulletin from the Department of Commerce, gotten out on the 20th of this month. The boll weevils are only in a few of the counties in our State, in the southwestern part. In the county of Barnwell this last season that county raised 30,496 bales of cotton, and the preceding season of 1918 that county raised 70,099 bales of cotton. Beaufort last season raised 2,232 bales of cotton and the preceding season raised 9,745 bales. Charleston County—I am not certain whether the weevil is in Charleston County or not—last season raised 8,723 bales of cotton as against 18,176 bales of cotton the preceding season. In Hampton County last season they raised 10,692 bales of cotton as against 25,928 bales the preceding season. In Jasper County they raised only 2,025 bales of cotton last season as compared with 7,296 the preceding season.

So it seems to me we ought to be liberal in appropriations in this bill, because in my opinion there will be a premium offered for the production of cotton within a very few years. It is a difficult matter to get labor, and the boll weevil is making great inroads. Our State raised over 100,000 less bales last season on account of this insect.

While we are appropriating money to destroy the ground squirrels, prairie dogs, and the cattle tick, I think at the same time the owners of the property ought to get exceedingly busy to help eradicate these pests. I looked over a map yesterday and I saw they have freed a large portion of the country from the cattle tick, but it is infesting a good many other sections yet. It seems to me they have been at that work a good long time, and I would like to have the Government money expended in the same way that individual money is spent. We ought to get 100 cents worth of work for $1 of Government money as well as other money. The people of this country ought to realize that while that is being done for the public good, at the same time it is work on individual property. I think the time will soon come when we will have the whole country rid of these pests, and if they do not come in, if the owners of the property do not come in and aid the Government agents in destroying these pests, possibly the appropriations will be discontinued. They are a little bit slow in bringing the cattle in and having them dipped. The people all over the country ought to realize the liberality of the Government and ought to join in and make every effort to have these pests destroyed rapidly, so we will be able to stop having to appropriate money. It will be a glad day in the South when it is entirely freed of the tick.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the subhead "States Relations Service," on page 74, line 17, after "$2,000," to insert "2 clerks, at $2,000 each"; in line 25, before the word "clerks," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "six" and insert "three"; on page 75, line 1, after the word "each," to strike out "1 clerk, $840; 1 clerk, $720"; in line 3, after the word "each," to strike out "1 messenger or laborer, $600" and insert "2 messengers or laborers, at $600 each"; and in line 7, after the words "in all," to strike out "$235,840" and insert "$236,180," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, States Relations Service: One director, $4,500; 1 chief clerk, $2,000; 1 clerk or chief accountant, $2,400; 1 financial clerk, $2,000; 2 clerks, at $2,000 each; 1 clerk, $1,980; 1 clerk or proof reader, $1,800; 5 clerks, class 4; 1 executive clerk, $1,740; 11 clerks, class 3; 2 clerks, at $1,500 each; 17 clerks, class 2; 2 clerks, at $1,320 each; 1 clerk, $1,260; 52 clerks, class 1; 1 clerk or artist-draftsman, $1,200; 1 clerk or machine operator, $1,200; 27 clerks, at $1,100 each; 39 clerks, at $1,000 each; 3 clerks, at $900 each; 2 messengers or laborers, at $840 each; 5 messengers or laborers, at $720 each; 2 messengers or laborers, at $600 each; 1 messenger or laborer, $480; 4 messenger boys, at $600 each; 13 messenger boys, at $480 each; 1 skilled laborer, $900; 4 charwomen, at $480 each; 16 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $236,180.

The next amendment was, on page 77, line 15, after the word "be," to strike out "alloted" and insert "allotted," so as to read:

For cooperative agricultural extension work, to be allotted, paid, and expended in the same manner, upon the same terms and conditions, and under the same supervision as the additional appropriations made by the act of May 8, 1914 (38 Stat. L., p. 372), entitled "An act to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture," $1,500,000.

The next amendment was, on page 78, after line 7, to strike out:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the organization and progress of farmers' institutes and agricultural schools in the several States and Territories, and upon similar organizations in foreign countries, with special suggestions of plans and methods for making such organizations more effective for the dissemination of the results of the work of the Department of Agriculture and the agricultural experiment stations, and of improved methods of agricultural practice, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses, $16,360.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not think this clause should be stricken out. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in discussing the matter; I am merely going to ask that the question be taken on a division as to whether or not the provision should be stricken out. It occurs to me that this clause provides for a very valuable work, and I think the action of the other House should be concurred in. The Department, however, has suggested an amendment to the clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi desire to propose an amendment to the amendment of the committee before the vote is taken on agreeing to it?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I will offer the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for the action of the Senate committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi to the committee amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed to be stricken from the bill by the committee, it is proposed to insert the following:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report concerning agriculture, for the purpose of agricultural education, and to cooperate with the Federal Board for Vocational Education in carrying out the provisions of section 6 of the act of Congress approved February 23, 1917, entitled "An act to promote vocational education," with special suggestions of plans and methods for making such organizations more effective for the dissemination of the results of the work of the Department of Agriculture and the agricultural experiment stations, and of improved methods of agricultural practice, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses, $13,000.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, it is possible that some of the work provided for in this clause should be carried on, but I desire to remind the Senate of the fact that in the pending bill we have changed the Office of Farm Management to the Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics, and that we have added $127,000 for that work. As I understand, the money appropriated by the paragraph is proposed to be expended entirely by the Department of Agriculture under the particular bureau referred to. I think it is the opinion of a large majority of the Members of the Senate that we ought to eliminate this provision, at least for a while, until the country is able to get on its feet. Appropriations of $16,000 here and there run into the hundreds of thousands and the hundreds of thousands run into the millions of dollars. I believe the Department of Agriculture will be able to do this proposed work just as efficiently and just as well in the interest of agriculture if this provision is eliminated.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the chairman of the committee a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. GRONNA. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator think that this work and the instruction in these schools can go on without this special provision being incorporated in the bill?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I believe this work can go on just the same as though this provision were inserted, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. But we should, then, have to increase the appropriation for some other provision, should we not?

Mr. SMOOT. No. I wish to say to the Senator that there is a permanent appropriation for that very purpose; that appropriation under the law increases each year from now on for two more years; and this amendment would simply be an appropriation of $13,000 for the duplication of work which is already being done.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, why has this appropriation been carried in previous bills?

Mr. SMOOT. For the same reason that applies in reference to other appropriation bills. Once an appropriation is inserted in an appropriation bill, it never goes out unless it is specifically eliminated by Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not get the impression from the department that this work would continue if this specific appropriation were not made. Of course, if the department can do the work without the appropriation just as well as they can do it with the appropriation, I do not wish to see the money appropriated; but my impression, gathered from the communications which I have received and from the hearings, was that it was necessary that this appropriation be retained in the bill if the work was to continue.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, of course, if we had plenty of money, it would perhaps do no harm to make this appropriation; but it only provides for reports as to the progress of farmers' institutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Mississippi knows that there is carried in this bill—we have just gone over that—an appropriation from the Treasury of about $1,500,000 for demonstration work; then the Smith-Lever law carries $3,580,000 this year, which will increase for two years more, until 1923; so that ultimately the appropriation will be $4,580,000, plus whatever is appropriated out of the Treasury. I really believe that we ought to stop right here and not try to duplicate this particular work, although I agree with the Senator from Mississippi that it is an important work.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely have offered the amendment as an expression of sentiment.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very glad to have the Senator offer the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator now that all the farmers in this country are watching these appropriations very carefully. I have a letter from Mr. Frank E. Williams, of Elkton, Md., which I received this morning, in which he says:

> MY DEAR SENATOR SMOOT: I beg to congratulate you upon your opposition to a new Government bureau in charge of farm management. I am, I suppose, the largest farmer in this county. My three grown sons are all practical working farmers. I am in contact daily with many farmers. What they want is relief from governmental extravagance; they are not calling for more bureaus to farm the farmer. We need real producers and fewer so-called experts running around the country to increase our expenses without adding anything of practical value.
> Yours, truly,
> FRANK E. WILLIAMS.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, that is a very good letter, and I agree with the farmer in the main; but let me say to the Senator that the farmer is entirely mistaken in one respect. The money which we appropriate is not appropriated for the purpose specified in the letter sent to the distinguished Senator from Utah——

Mr. SMOOT. That is to "farm the farmers."

Mr. GRONNA. It is not to "farm the farmer," nor to show the farmer how to do his work. The money we appropriate in this bill—and I hope Senators will understand that—is to enable the Department of Agriculture and the farmers themselves to ascertain the costs of production. In all seriousness, what is more important to any industry than to know the cost of the articles produced? How long would the boot-and-shoe industry or a clothing manufacturing concern continue in business if they did not know their costs. Here we have an industry which, according to the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, will show an estimated value upon the prices fixed by the Department of Agriculture for the cereal crops alone of more than $14,000,000,000. The total value of all crops, including stock, amounts to more than $24,000,000,000. It seems to me that is a fairly good-sized business; and why any farmer should object to the adoption of a financial system so as to enable him to ascertain the cost of the article he is producing, whether it is a cereal, whether it is cotton, or whether it is stock, I can not understand. As I have said, the letter is a good letter, but the writer misunderstands the appropriation which we provide for in this bill of $127,000 to carry on the additional work which will be done under the Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi as a substitute for the House text proposed to be stricken out.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment proposed by the committee to strike out from line 8 to line 18, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 78, line 24, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$205,000" and insert "$210,000," and on page 79, line 6, after the words "United States," to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$20,000," so as to make the clause read:

> To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, the island of Guam, and the Virgin Islands of the United States, including the erection of buildings, the preparation, illustration, and distribution of reports and bulletins, and all other necessary expenses, $210,000, as follows: Alaska, $75,000, of which $11,800, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be immediately available for the erection of buildings, purchase of breeding live stock, and other expenses connected with the stock-breeding experiments on the island of Kodiak and at the Matanuska station; Hawaii, $50,000; Porto Rico, $50,000; Guam, $15,000; and the Virgin Islands of the United States, $20,000; and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to sell such products as are obtained on the land belonging to the agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, the island of Guam, and the Virgin Islands of the United States, and the amount obtained from the sale thereof shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts: Provided, That of the sum herein appropriated for the experiment station in Hawaii $10,000 may be used in agricultural extension work in Hawaii.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 80, line 7, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$4,630,280" and insert "$4,618,920," so as to make the clause read:

> In all, for general expenses, $4,618,920.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 80, line 8, after the word "Service," to strike out "$4,866,120" and insert "$4,855,100," so as to make the clause read:

> Total for States Relations Service, $4,855,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Public Roads," on page 80, line 18, before the words "class 2," to strike out "1 clerk" and insert "6 clerks"; in line 20, before the word "clerks," to strike out "six" and insert "seven"; on page 81, line 1, before the word "clerks," to strike out "nine" and insert "four"; in line 2, before the words "1 mechanician," to strike out "4 clerks, at $900 each"; and in line 13, after the words "in all," to strike out "$117,900" and insert "$117,500," so as to make the clause read:

> Salaries, Bureau of Public Roads: One chief of bureau, $6,000; 1 draftsman or clerk, $1,920; 1 clerk, $1,900; 1 instrument maker, $1,800; 1 model maker, $1,800; 4 clerks, class 4; 7 clerks, class 3; 1 clerk or editorial clerk, $1,600; 3 clerks, at $1,500 each; 1 clerk or photographer, $1,440; 1 clerk or instrument maker, $1,440; 1 clerk or tabulator, $1,440; 6 clerks, class 2; 2 clerks, at $1,380 each; 2 clerks, at $1,320 each; 4 clerks, at $1,260 each; 7 clerks, class 1; 1 clerk or editorial clerk, $1,200; 1 draftsman, $1,320; 1 clerk or draftsman, $1,200; 1 clerk or draftsman, $900; 1 clerk or photographer, $1,200; one clerk or photographer, $1,000; two clerks, at $1,140 each; 1 clerk, $1,100; 2 clerks, at $1,080 each; 1 clerk, $1,020; 4 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 clerk or skilled laborer, $1,000; 1 mechanician, $1,680; 1 clerk or instrument maker, $1,200; 1 lantern-slide colorist, $1,320; 1 mechanic, $2,100; 1 mechanic, $1,500; 1 mechanic, $1,200; 1 skilled laborer, $1,200; 1 skilled laborer or mechanic, $840; 1 laboratory aid, $960; 1 telephone operator, $720; 2 laborers, at $900 each; 2 messengers or laborers, at $840 each; 2 messengers, laborers, or laboratory helpers, at $720 each; 2 messengers or laborers, at $660 each; 4 messengers or laborers, at $600 each; 3 messenger boys, at $600 each; 1 fireman, $720; 8 messenger boys, at $480 each; 8 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $117,500.

The next amendment was, on page 82, line 7, after the word "maintenance," to insert "including cooperation with State and municipal governments in roadside planting of ornamental fruit and nut-bearing trees, the beautification of highways, and the education of the public to a fuller appreciation of scenic values as a factor in rural development and as a nationalizing influence, $102,300," so as to make the clause read:

> For investigations of the best methods of road making, especially ordinary sand-clay and dirt roads, and the best kinds of road-making materials, and for furnishing expert advice on road building and maintenance, including cooperation with State and municipal governments in roadside planting of ornamental fruit and nut-bearing trees, the beautification of highways, and the education of the public to a fuller appreciation of scenic values as a factor in rural development and as a nationalizing influence, $102,300.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that this paragraph go over, at the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The next amendment was, on page 82, after line 17, to insert:

For conducting field experiments and various methods of road construction and maintenance, and investigations concerning various road materials and preparations; for investigating and developing equipment intended for the preparation and application of bituminous and other binders; for the purchase of materials and equipment; for the employment of assistants and labor, $50,000.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that this paragraph be passed over, at the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the paragraph will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 84, line 5, after the word "farm," to insert "sanitary," and, in line 6, before the word "disposal," to strike out "drainage" and insert "sewage," so as to make the clause read:

For investigating farm sanitary domestic water supply and sewage disposal, the construction of farm buildings, and other rural engineering problems involving mechanical principles, including the erection of such structures outside of the District of Columbia as may be necessary for experimental purposes only, the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, supplies, and all other necessary expenses, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, line 1, after the word "products," to strike out "$275,980" and insert "$317,520: Provided, That not less than $20,000 shall be used for a study of the methods of prevention of losses by deterioration, decay, and freezing of fruits and vegetables in storage and in transit in refrigerator cars, heater cars, and ocean vessels, including demonstrations of such methods," so as to make the clause read:

For acquiring and diffusing among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with the marketing and distributing of farm and nonmanufactured food products and the purchasing of farm supplies, independently and in cooperation with other branches of the department, State agencies, purchasing and consuming organizations, and persons engaged in the transportation, marketing, and distributing of farm and food products, $317,520: Provided, That not less than $20,000 shall be used for a study of the methods of prevention of losses by deterioriation, decay, and freezing of fruits and vegetables in storage and in transit in refrigerator cars, heater cars, and ocean vessels, including demonstrations of such methods.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, with reference to the amendment that has just been agreed to, I want to urge the members of the committee who are likely to be upon the conference committee to use their best efforts to keep that amendment in the bill. We really ought to have a larger amount, but I feel that the committee have done the very best they felt they possibly could do under the circumstances.

I desire to say that according to my information something like 2,000 or 2,500 carloads of apples were very greatly damaged during the last winter because of failure to be cared for as they ought to have been, and failure to receive proper protection from the weather in bringing them across the country. The purpose of this amendment is to develop and demonstrate better methods of caring for fruit, especially in refrigerator cars and in transportation.

As I said, I wish we could have had more, but I am very glad the committee have felt justified in putting in this amount, and I am satisfied that it will bring great benefit if they can get the House to see it as they have seen it. I hope they will be able to do that.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I very heartily concur in what the Senator from Washington has just said. This is a most highly important amendment. My attention has been called to it by many correspondents from the Northwest. It is a matter of great importance to the Northwest, and covers a character of work that heretofore has not had much attention for lack of funds; but the department now realizes the necessity of that class of work, and, being given some funds, I am sure it will receive adequate attention, and will be highly beneficial, if the item is retained in conference, as I hope it may be.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, there is no doubt of the value of the work that can be accomplished under this appropriation, nor of the great losses that have been sustained along this line by the fruit growers of the West and Northwest.

The Senator from Washington states that the amount should be larger. I want to state, for his benefit and that of the Senator from Montana, that when the matter was presented to the department at a hearing before the Agricultural Committee I spoke to the representative of the department about the necessity and practicability of this work, and the agent of the Department of Agriculture stated that he would not only use the $20,000 specifically provided by this amendment, but such a general sum out of the aggregate appropriation as would bring the total to the amount of $40,000, which was the sum sought by the Senator from Washington.

That explanation, perhaps, is due on that item.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 87, after line 6, to strike out:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to gather from stockmen, live-stock associations, State live-stock and agricultural boards, common carriers, stockyards, commission firms, live-stock exchanges, slaughtering and meat-packing companies, and others information relative to the number of different classes and grades of marketable live stock, especially cattle, hogs, and sheep in the principal live-stock feeding districts and growing sections; prices, receipts, and shipments of the different classes and grades of cattle, hogs, and sheep at live-stock market centers; prices of meats, fish, and meat and fish food products and the amounts of such products in storage; to compile and publish such information at such frequent intervals as most effectively to guide producers, consumers, and distributors in the sale and purchase of live stock, meats, fish, and other animal products; and to gather and publish any related information pertaining to marketing and distribution of live stock, meats, fish, and animal by-products, the sum of $89,320.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 88, to insert:

For collecting and distributing by telegraph, mail, and otherwise timely information on the market supply, demand, commercial movement, disposition, quality, and market prices of live stock, meats, fish, and animal by-products, the sum of $89,320.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 88, line 7, before the word "supply," to insert "market," so as to make the clause read:

For collecting and distributing, by telegraph, mail, and otherwise, timely information on the market supply, demand, commercial movement, location, disposition, quality, and market prices of fruits, vegetables, peanuts and their products, dairy and poultry products, grain, hay, feeds, and seeds, $314,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 89, line 6, after the word "contained," to strike out "$141,700" and insert "$150,000," so as to make the clause read:

For enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and certify to shippers and other interested parties the quality and condition of fruits, vegetables, poultry, butter, hay, and other perishable farm products, when received in interstate commerce at such important central markets as the Secretary of Agriculture may from time to time designate, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, including payment of such fees as will be reasonable and as nearly as may be to cover the cost for the service rendered: Provided, That certificates issued by the authorized agents of the department shall be received in all courts of the United States as prima facie evidence of the truth of the statements therein contained, $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 89, line 20, after the word "methods," to strike out "$40,000" and insert "$77,750," so as to make the clause read:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with the several States in the employment of agents to acquire and diffuse useful information connected with the distribution and marketing of farm products through investigational, demonstrational, or extension methods, $77,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 90, line 12, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$1,042,805" and insert "$1,130,395," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $1,130,395.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 90, after line 21, to insert: ": Provided, That the amendments to said act contained in section 6 of the act of March 4, 1919 (Public, No. 348, 65th Cong.), are hereby recognized and declared to be permanent legislation," so as to make the clause read:

Enforcement of the United States cotton-futures act: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the United States cotton-futures act, as amended March 4, 1919, including all expenses necessary for the purchase of equipment and supplies; for travel; for the employment of persons in the city of Washington, and elsewhere; and for all other expenses, including rent outside of the District of Columbia, that may be necessary in executing the provisions of this act, $142,611: Provided, That the amendments to said act contained in section 6 of the act of March 4, 1919 (Public, No. 348, 65th Cong.), are hereby recognized and declared to be permanent legislation.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I think it will be necessary to further amend this amendment. I offer the following as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed substitute.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In lieu of the reported proviso at the end of page 90, insert the following:

Provided, That the amendments relating to cotton provided for in section 6 of the act known as the wheat-guarantees act approved March 4, 1919, are hereby recognized and declared to be permanent legislation.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRONNA. The junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. COMER] has an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senate committee. So I will ask that it may go over until we finish the reading of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, that amendment does not affect the Senate committee amendment at all. It is a new matter, and deals entirely with a different subject, as I understand it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill to let it be disposed of now. I do not think it will take long. It relates to the same subject matter as the committee amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. But the purposes of the two are not the same?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; they are for the same purpose.

Mr. GRONNA. I have no objection to considering it now if the Senator thinks it relates to the same matter. I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. COMER], and so far as I know none of the Senators from the cotton States have any objection to it. If I am not correct in that statement, I trust that some of them will correct me.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know of no opposition to it myself, and I would be glad if the Senator in charge of the bill will give an opportunity to have it considered now.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well.

Mr. COMER. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. It ought to read "And provided further," I should think.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think so. I think the amendment does not require any further proviso. It merely amends the existing law to the extent that the amendment reads. The Senator's amendment explains itself. It does not require a proviso. It is to be inserted, as the amendment provides, at the end of line 25, page 90.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add after the word "legislation," on page 90, line 25, the following:

That hereafter each lot of cotton classified as tenderable in whole or in part on a section 5 contract of said act as amended, shall give to the buyer the right to demand that one-half of the contract shall be delivered in the official cotton standard grades of the United States from the grades of middling fair, strict good middling, good middling, strict middling, and middling, and that the seller shall have the option of delivering the other half of said contract from any of the official cotton standard grades as established in said act.

Mr. COMER. Mr. President, this amendment is offered for the purpose of giving cotton contractors on exchanges protection in delivery. As it is now, there are 10 different grades of cotton delivered under contract—low middling, strict low middling, middling, good middling, strict good middling, and middling fair—and in the colored grades strict middling tinges, good middling tinges, and good middling yellow stained.

In the contract as at present written the seller has from the 25th of the preceding month to the end of the succeeding month to tender delivery, or, in other words, to name the date at which he will deliver under the contract. He has no special date except within that time. In addition to that the seller has the option of delivering any one of these grades, or any two of them, any three of them, or any combination of them, the buyer having to take just what is offered him within that time, at the time it is offered him.

The purpose of this amendment is to give the buyer the one-half, I will call it; in order words, give him from middling to middling fair for one-half of it, leaving the seller to select from those grades such as he would want to deliver within that limit. It also leaves the seller to deliver the other 50 bales, any part of the 10 grades that he wishes. He still has a free scope in the matter.

I am free to admit, Mr. President, that the restrictions ought to be much closer than that. In other words, a cotton contract ought to be exactly like a corn contract or a wheat contract or a meat contract. You can go and buy from one to ten thousand bushels of wheat, or from one to ten thousand bushels of corn, or any quantity of meat, and they deliver what you buy. With cotton it has been very, very different, and this multiplicity of grades is the cause of all this trouble which we have with the cotton exchanges.

The cotton exchanges are intended to be the barometer of the market, not the thermometer. You can see how the barometer is and you know what the weather is or is going to be, and that is right; it shows the true weather condition and indicates the future.

But the cotton exchange is like a thermometer. You can heat the bulb and the mercury goes up, or you can put the temperature down and the mercury goes off. In other words, it is governed by fluctuating conditions, and cotton is the only agricultural product we have where the mercury is used or allowed to be used. In other words, with every other crop except cotton it is the law of supply and demand that governs the exchanges. With cotton it is very different from that, and the greater the number of grades that can be tendered on a contract the greater the possibility of the use of the gambling facilities. We had 21 grades before this amendment was made last year. The seller could select any combination of those 21 grades, if he saw proper, and deliver to a buyer, and deliver within 30 days, too, and thus bring factitious conditions on the mercury.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COMER. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice in the proposed amendment of the Senator that there are five grades of cotton mentioned that will be classified as tenderable on a cotton contract. The Lever Act I think covers the same matter, and as I remember there were only four grades mentioned in that act. The Senators from South Carolina and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] have been very much interested in having this class of legislation enacted at as early a date as possible on account of the Lever Act expiring with the close of the war, which would leave the sale of the cotton on the cotton exchanges the same as it was before the passage of the Lever Act. I wanted to ask the Senator what grade is added in his proposed amendment to those which are now included in the Lever Act?

Mr. COMER. I am glad the Senator asked me that question. There is no grade added. It is simply an arrangement of the grades by which the seller will have to deliver one half of it, running from middling to middling fair of five grades. He can deliver the other half of it just as he pleases within the 10 grades.

Mr. OVERMAN. There are not 21 grades now.

Mr. COMER. Under the old act there were 21 grades, but that was found to be perfectly inoperative. The Lever Act made 10 grades. There is no change in the number of grades. There is just some limitation in the delivery of the grades, that is all.

Mr. SMOOT. This is the law:

In the fifth subdivision of section 5 of said act, strike out the words "good ordinary" whenever the same occur and substitute therefor the words "low middling"; strike out the words "low middling" and substitute therefor the word "middling"; and strike out the words "if stained, cotton that is below the grade of middling," and substitute therefor the words "if yellow stained, cotton that is below the grade of strict middling, or, if blue stained, cotton that is below the grade of good middling," so that the said subdivision shall read as follows.

Mr. COMER. I know that; I am perfectly familiar with all the bills on it and can answer any questions. The eliminations that are authorized by law reduce them from 21 grades to 10 grades, and those grades commence with low middling and go to middling fair. It carries seven grades called white cotton. In the colors it goes from strict middling tinges to good middling tinges and good middling light yellow stains, and these are the very grades we are dealing with now. There is no reduction from the number of grades. The only thing we are proposing to do is to make some specific arrangement as to the delivery of these.

Mr. SMOOT. I am aware of the workings of the law, but what I am getting at is that the Finance Committee have already agreed on an amendment to existing law. In the amendment there are only four grades named, and the amendment of the Senator from Alabama mentions five grades. I am perfectly willing to allow the five grades to be put in, but I was not certain whether the Senator from South Carolina would be willing.

Mr. COMER. Senators are certainly easy with a new man, and I wish to thank them all. This is the first speech I have tried to make in 10 years, except one. I will state to the Senate that I am a farmer and a manufacturer. As the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said awhile ago, I have handled quite a bit of cotton on the exchanges, and my experiences make me perfectly familiar with it. It would have been perfectly easy for me to answer any questions, because I have gone into the matter very carefully. I want to thank the Senators for their consideration.

Two-thirds of the cotton crop runs middling and better, and two-thirds of the cotton mills use those grades of cotton. This is the reason why I wanted these changes made. There is a great deal of trouble in controlling the cotton exchanges and getting them to represent anything like the commercial price basis. I have the daily papers here. In the New York Times of March 24 March cotton was quoted 42.50. At one time it was quoted 43.18 and closed at 42.80. At New Orleans on that date March cotton was 38.50 and closed at 38.45. In New York July cotton was 35.02, 36.31, and 35.60. This simply shows you how they vary in it. In other words, here is July cotton more than 7 cents a pound cheaper than March cotton at the same time, and you have to go through the same crop to get to July. The same thing is true of May; we have May 2 or 3 cents a pound cheaper than March, and you have to go through this year's crop to get it. You can not get a crop before that time.

To give you further evidence, I have from the Bureau of Markets the figures on cotton for the past month. On February 20 March cotton in New York was 36.52, and I have just read you that a few days ago it was 42.50, even as high as 43.18.

You may ask why do you not buy these distant months at the lower price and hold them until they mature? I am perfectly candid. There is this trouble, that the dealer who can not afford to take the contract up is frequently compelled to sell the contract out and involve in serious loss in that way. Take March cotton, which was yesterday at 43.18 and was 36.52 on the 20th of February. It was the man who had sold this hedge that was hurt. This is what they call shearing the lamb, and it is very thoroughly done, but it is the buyer who can hold out and receive a tender that reaps the harvest. Anyone who will take the New York Exchange quotations from February 20 to March 25, 1920, noting the remarkable changes in which March cotton advanced more than 6 cents a pound, while all the spot-cotton markets varied the least, will appreciate just how the exchange market varies and the danger of it. The producer and the manufacturer want a reliable regular market, showing at all times the true condition of things. Violent fluctuations in the futures market are dangerous to all business except the gambler, and, as a rule, it is the gambler who makes it. The futures market should always be the true reflex of the commercial market.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I have not spoken with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and I do not know what his views about the bill are, but I know he is very anxious to have the bill remain as it is reported by the committee. I see no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. COMER]. In fact, I think it is perfectly proper. The objection to the limited number of grades would be that there would be less chance for the growers of cotton to get rid of their cotton.

If you restrict it to a few numbers you will not get rid of the offgrade cotton.

I think the amendment is absolutely proper as offered by the Senator from Alabama and makes the provision as it ought to be. It merely specifies what you are getting, at least in part. It does not go far enough, really, but if he is content with it I am. It is just like this: If you want to buy a carload of brick you would not know whether you meant hard-burned brick or salmon brick or something like that.

Mr. SMOOT. You would know before you purchased it.

Mr. DIAL. You ought to know, but you do not. That is not in this contract. In the amendment the grower is authorized to select 1 of 5 grades and the purchaser to select the other grades out of the 10 grades mentioned in the general law.

Mr. SMOOT. I am familiar with the form of transaction under the purchase of futures in cotton. I have purchased cotton that way myself. I have no objection to the amendment, if the Senators from South Carolina and the senior Senator from Alabama do not object. I am perfectly willing to the five grades instead of four.

Mr. DIAL. I see no objection to it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, on page 91, line 14, after the word "elsewhere," to strike out "$24,400" and insert "$50,000," so as to make the clause read:

Administration of the United States warehouse act: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the United States warehouse act, including the payment of such rent outside of the District of Columbia and the employment of such persons and means as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, line 21, after the word "bureau," to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$5,000," so as to make the clause read:

Completion of wool work: To enable the Bureau of Markets to complete the work of the Domestic Wool Section of the War Industries Board and to enforce the Government regulations for handling the wool clip of 1918 as established by the Wool Division of said board, pursuant to the Executive order dated December 31, 1918, transferring such work to the said bureau, $5,000.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Enforcement of the insecticide act," on page 92, line 2, after the word "each," to strike out "two clerks, at $1,000 each" and insert "one clerk, $1,000"; in line 3, before the word "insecticide," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; in line 4, after the word "each," to strike out "two clerks and sample collectors, at $1,000 each" and insert "one insecticide and fungicide inspector, $1,400," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, enforcement of the insecticide act: One executive officer, $2,750; 1 executive assistant, $2,000; 1 clerk, class 3; 1 clerk, class 2; 4 clerks, class 1; 2 clerks, at $1,140 each; 1 clerk, $1,000; 4 insecticide and fungicide inspectors, at $1,600 each; 1 insecticide and fungicide inspector, $1,400; 1 sample and storeroom custodian, $1,200; 1 laboratory helper, $840; 1 laboratory helper, $720; 1 laboratory helper, $600; 1 unskilled laborer, $600; 1 unskilled laborer, $480; 2 messenger boys, at $480 each; 1 messenger boy, $360; 2 charwomen, at $480 each; in all, $30,350.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I desire may be stated.

Mr. GRONNA. I trust the Senator will kindly defer offering his amendment until we have finished the committee amendments. The Senator may then offer his amendment.

Mr. GAY. Then I will defer offering my amendment at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Louisiana that under the unanimous-consent agreement committee amendments must first be disposed of, and after they shall have been disposed of the Senator may offer his amendment.

Mr. GAY. Very well.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the subhead "Federal Horticultural Board," on page 93, line 3, after "$2,280," to strike out "1 executive clerk, $2,000; 1 executive clerk, $2,000" and insert "2 executive clerks, at $2,000 each," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, Federal Horticultural Board: One secretary of board, $2,280; 2 executive clerks, at $2,000 each; 1 clerk, $1,980; 1 clerk, class 4; 1 clerk, class 3; 1 clerk, $1,560; 3 clerks, at $1,440 each; 2 clerks, class 2; 2 clerks, at $1,260 each; 7 clerks, class 1; 1 messenger boy, $600; 1 messenger boy, $480; 2 messenger boys, at $360 each; 1 charwoman, $240; in all, $33,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, after line 7, to insert:

Plant quarantine act: That the plant quarantine act, approved August 20, 1912 (37 Stat., p. 315), be, and is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following section:

"SEC. 15. That in order further to control and eradicate and to prevent the dissemination of dangerous plant diseases and insect infections and infestations no plant or plant products for or capable of propagation, including nursery stock, hereinafter referred to as plants and plant products, shall be moved or allowed to be moved, shipped, transported, or carried by any means whatever into or out of the District of Columbia except in compliance with such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture as hereinafter provided. Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture, after investigation, shall determine that any plants and plant products in the District of Columbia are infested or infected with insect pests and diseases, and that any place, articles, and substances used or connected therewith are so infested or infected, written notice thereof shall be given by him to the owner or person in possession or control thereof, and such owner or person shall forthwith control or eradicate and prevent the dissemination of such insect pest or disease, and shall remove, cut, or destroy such infested and infected plants, plant products, and articles and substances used or connected therewith, which are hereby declared to be nuisances, within the time and in the manner required in said notice or by the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture. Whenever such owner or person can not be found, or shall fail, neglect, or refuse to comply with the foregoing provisions of this section, the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and required to control and eradicate and prevent dissemination of such insect pest or disease and to remove, cut, or destroy infested or infected plants and plant products and articles and substances used or connected therewith, and the United States shall have an action of debt against such owner or persons for expenses incurred by the Secretary of Agriculture in that behalf. Employees of the Federal Horticultural Board are hereby authorized and required to inspect places, plants, and plant products and articles and substances used or connected therewith whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine that such inspections are necessary for the purposes of this section. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions and requirements of this section and of the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture made hereunder, and the notices given pursuant thereto, employees of the Federal Horticultural Board shall have power with a warrant to enter into or upon any place and open any bundle, package, or other container of plants or plant products whenever they shall have cause to believe that infections or infestations of plant pests and diseases exist therein or thereon, and when such infections or infestations are found to exist after notice by the Secretary of Agriculture to the owner or person in possession or control thereof and an opportunity by said owner or person to be heard, to destroy the infected or infested plants or plant products contained therein. The police court or the municipal court of the District of Columbia shall have power, upon information supported by oath or affirmation showing probable cause for believing that there exists in any place, bundle, package, or other container in the District of Columbia any plant or plant product which is infected or infested with plant pests or disease, to issue warrants for the search for and seizure of all such plants and plant products. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture, and he is hereby required, from time to time, to make and promulgate such rules and regulations as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes of this section, and any person who shall move or allow to be moved, or shall ship, transport, or carry, by any means whatever, any plant or plant products from or into the District of Columbia, except in compliance with the rules and regulations prescribed under this section, shall be punished, as is provided in section 10 of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Miscellaneous," on page 97, line 21, after the word "elsewhere," to strike out "$30,000" and insert "$47,000," so as to make the clause read:

Demonstrations on reclamation projects: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to encourage and aid in the agricultural development of the Government reclamation projects; to assist, through demonstrations, advice, and in other ways, settlers on the projects; and for the employment of persons and means necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $47,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 98, line 1, after the word "emergency," to insert "and to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with the War Department in the maintenance of an air patrol for fire prevention and suppression on the national forests of the Pacific coast and the Rocky Mountain regions, $60,000; in all, $310,000," so as to make the clause read:

Fighting and preventing forest fires: For fighting and preventing forest fires, $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, but not to exceed $150,000 of this fund shall be expended except in cases of extraordinary emergency; and to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with the War Department in the maintenance of an air patrol for fire prevention and suppression on the national forests of the Pacific coast and the Rocky Mountain regions, $60,000; in all, $310,000.

The next amendment was, on page 98, line 16, after the word "rivers," to strike out "$75,000" and insert "$125,000," so as to make the clause read:

Cooperative fire protection of forested watersheds of navigable streams: For cooperation with any State or group of States in the protection from fire of the forested watersheds of navigable streams under the provisions of section 2 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," $125,000.

Mr. NUGENT. I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment. On page 98, line 16, I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out the numerals "$125,000" and inserting the numerals "$200,000," so as to make the appropriation $200,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho to the committee amendment.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, in company with the Forester, I appeared before the Senate Committee on Agriculture in respect to the matter of the protection of our forests from fire, and it was presented in considerable detail. I desire to say that I am grateful to the committee for its action in increasing the appropriation made by the House to the extent of $50,000, and I am offering this amendment not because I am not grateful, but because of the tremendous interest, on the part of the people of the West particularly, in the protection of the forests from ravages by fire.

Mr. President, the people of the State of Idaho are very deeply interested in this question, as are also the people of the country generally, and they would manifest a much deeper interest in it, in my judgment, if they were familiar with the facts. In Idaho there are 720,000 acres of timberlands owned by the State; in other words, the people of that State, as a whole, own that number of acres of forest lands; and there are millions of acres in my State of timberlands owned by the Federal Government. I take the position that as timber is one of the great natural resources of the country, every possible effort should be put forth to preserve it.

It is a conceded fact, Mr. President, particularly in arid States such as Idaho, that it is vitally necessary to the prosperity, the happiness, and the well-being of all the people that the watersheds be not denuded of timber and undergrowth; otherwise, there will not be sufficient water for agricultural purposes. If the watersheds on our streams are denuded of such timber and undergrowth, as a matter of course, there will be no means by which the water supply, consisting of snow and rain, may be conserved; with the result that in the spring there will be a rapid run-off of the snow which has fallen during the winter months, with a consequent flood stage, so far as the streams are concerned, for a time and a low-water stage and practically a drought at times at the season of the year when the crops are maturing. Such a condition would lead to incalculable loss, so far as our farmers are concerned. The same thing is true in large measure of the stock interests.

Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a few figures in connection with this matter, in order that there may be a full and complete understanding of the importance of the preservation of the forests.

I desire to say that approximately one-half of all the standing merchantable timber in the United States is located in the States of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, and Idaho, and that it is estimated that in those States there are 1,523,000,000 thousand feet, board measure. At the low estimate of $1 per thousand feet, that represents a money value of $1,523,000,000. In those States the timber within national forests aggregates 407,309,635 thousand feet, board measure, and at the same estimate of $1 per thousand it represents a money value of $407,309,635. In the State of Idaho alone there is now in Government ownership more than one-third of all the standing merchantable timber, to wit, 49,110,374,000 feet. The value of that timber at $1 per thousand feet, board measure, is in excess of $49,000,000.

Mr. President, the sum of money represented by this standing timber, as must be apparent to the mind of every man, is tremendously large, and if the timber is destroyed by forest fires, as a matter of course, the money is lost. It is my judgment that the Government of the United States should cooperate in every possible way to protect the interests of our people in the timber throughout those five Western and Northwestern States.

I was very glad to do everything I could to bring about the establishment of an airplane patrol of our forests, and I do not doubt that the establishment of that patrol will result in the saving of large areas of timberlands throughout the West. At this time it is in more or less of an experimental stage, but I hope it will prove so effective that within the next two or three years it will be extended to all other sections of the country on which there are forests.

I desire also to call attention to the fact that, in the five States I have mentioned, in 1918 there was an area burned over within the national forests of 619,694 acres, and outside of the national forests 432,136 acres, or a total of 1,051,830 acres. The quantity of timber destroyed in 1918 inside and outside of the national forests amounted to $1,737,774 and the timber that was damaged inside and outside of national forests amounted to $1,455,624. Last year was the dryest year known in the Northwest for many years prior thereto, and the loss of timber by fire was enormous. There was one fire in the neighborhood of what is known as the Thunder Mountain section of Idaho that extended over 160 square miles of land and destroyed hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of timber—not only timber in Government ownership but also timber in private ownership—and it is estimated that the quantity of timber destroyed in the States mentioned last year aggregated the sum of about $3,976,981.

I have made some inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining what steps were taken in 1919 by the private corporations owning timber in Idaho, as well as by the State, for the purpose of protecting the forests against fire, and also for the purpose of ascertaining the sums of money expended in that behalf, and I have here a telegram from the secretary of the Northern Idaho Forestry Association, in which he says, among other things:

> The amount spent by the North Idaho associations only in protecting forests from fire was $360,000, of which amount the State spent about $98,000. The balance was paid by lumber companies.

In other words, the State of Idaho, owning 700,000 acres of timber land, expended in its protection the sum of about $98,000 and the private lumbering interests in northern Idaho alone expended the sum of $262,000. This telegram also states that private agencies in Montana, Idaho, Washington, Oregon, and California project 25,000,000 acres, of which lumber companies own about 1,125,000 acres, and that private agencies in the above five States spent over $800,000 last year in forest protection.

I also communicated with the governor of the State of Idaho in respect of the same matter, and he has advised me as follows:

> In 1919 the State expended $97,672, of which $58,609 has been paid by the State. The balance is a deficit to be met by the legislature. No funds for the present year. State holding approximately 720,000 acres. There are in Idaho 13,000,000 acres public domain not included in the forests, half of which is subject to grass and timber fires. This needs protection on account water conservation.
> D. W. DAVIS.

In 1911 what is commonly known as the Weeks law was enacted by the Congress, and it is that law that is referred to in the item in the pending bill on page 98 which I am seeking to amend. That bill provided, among other things, for the appropriation of $200,000 to be expended in cooperation with the States that desired to cooperate in the preservation of watersheds of navigable streams, and so forth, throughout the country. According to my understanding of the matter the Secretary of Agriculture this year estimated for the $200,000 that was appropriated in 1911, and sums have been appropriated each year since under that law. The House committee, however, for reasons satisfactory, no doubt, to its members, saw fit to reduce the sum estimated for to $75,000, and the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry increased it to $125,000.

Mr. President, last year there were 24 States participating in that fund, and I have been advised that the allotment to the State of Idaho amounted to approximately $4,500, which, as a matter of fact, was but a small sum in comparison with the sums expended by the State and by private lumbering interests. In other words, while under this particular law there were $4,500 allotted to Idaho, private lumbering interests in the northern part of that State expended approximately $262,000, while the State expended about $98,000 in the protection of the forests.

As I stated before, in view of the tremendous importance of such protection, and in view of the very large sums of money that are being expended both by private lumbering interests and by the State, it appears to me that the Government should not be at all niggardly in appropriations in that behalf. More particularly is that true when those appropriations are used for the purpose of protecting about 80,000,000 acres of forested land now in Government ownership.

Before I take my seat, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to another fact, and that is that last year the receipts from national forests amounted to the sum of more than $4,300,000, and the major portion of those receipts was derived from grazing permits. In other words, there are hundreds of thousands—yes, millions—of sheep, cattle, and horses grazing within the forest reserves throughout the entire West, and the revenue derived by the Government by reason of that fact is increasing year by year. I do not doubt that if the forests are protected in order that the snows may be conserved and the ranges preserved, the number of live stock ranging within them will be increased with each succeeding year, and, as a matter of course, the revenue derived by the Governmest therefrom will also be increased.

I trust that the chairman of the committee may see his way clear to accept this proposed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 98, line 16, in the amendment proposed by the committee, it is proposed to strike out "$125,000" and insert "$200,000."

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I fully realize that this is a matter of very great importance; but the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry thought they were rather liberal in increasisg this appropriation $60,000. That was done to enable the War Department to cooperate with the Agricultural Department in locating and extinguishing fires. Speaking for the committee—I do not say all the members, but I believe a majority of the members—we think that this amount is sufficient, and that we ought not further to increase this appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. NUGENT. I call for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is called for. Those in favor of the amendment to the amendment will rise and be counted. Those opposed will rise and be counted. Those in favor of the amendment are 12, and those opposed are 5; therefore the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will state it.

Mr. POMERENE. Does or does not the statement just made indicate whether or not there is a quorum present?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is always in order to suggest the absence of a quorum, but as long as the present occupant of the chair is in the chair he is going to let the Senate know by what votes things are done. He is not going to ask Senators to take the opinion of the Chair and declare that an amendment is carried without letting Senators know how many voted for it and how many voted against it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I find no fault with the announcement of the Chair. I fully realize that the amendment is carried, and I agree to that; but I simply want to say that the Senator from Idaho is endangering the amount of $60,000, because the probability is that the whole thing will go out in conference. It was my purpose, as chairman of the committee, to keep the $60,000 in the bill. I must confess to the Senate that I can not and will not in conference agree to the increased amount carried in the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from North Dakota that a separate vote can be had upon this matter when the bill comes into the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. I shall ask for a separate vote on it in the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah will state it.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Chair to say that there were 12 Senators who voted for the amendment and 5 who voted against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it possible to have an amendment agreed to when the RECORD shows only 17 Senators voting?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated the result of the vote. More voted in favor of the amendment than voted against it. The Senate can take such course as it pleases upon that statement. The Chair can not make any motion.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, my object was not to have it appear in the RECORD that an amendment could be agreed to by a vote of 12 for and 5 against, less than a majority of the Senate voting upon the question. In my opinion, the amendment has not been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Utah desires to raise any parliamentary inquiry, the Chair will submit the matter to the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. I trust the Senator from Utah will not do that. I think the committee is perfectly satisfied. The amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] was carried, and, so far as I am concerned, I think the members of the committee are satisfied that it did carry.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I make a parliamentary inquiry. Is not an announcement by the Chair that only 17 Senators are present equivalent to the suggestion of the absence of a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No one suggested the absence of a quorum. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] commented on the significance of the figures.

Mr. NORRIS. May I make a parliamentary suggestion to the Chair? The Chair only announced the result of the vote. It may be that there are 96 Senators sitting here, and that only 17 voted. That is all the Chair is concerned with, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It may be that the matter is receiving absent treatment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington will state it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand that the Chair has not announced whether the amendment is carried or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did state that the amendment was agreed to. The Chair, however, is not infallible, and each Senator may have his opinion as to whether it was agreed to or not.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, it seems to me that when the Chair announces that 17 Senators only have voted, without a further statement that there is not a quorum present, it raises the question of a quorum itself, and there can not be any business transacted without the showing that there is a quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will pardon the Chair, the Chair does not agree with his statement. Frequently upon a call of the Senate a quorum is disclosed, and so announced, and yet many motions are carried with only one Senator voting, and a great many are declared carried where there is no response on either side.

Mr. KIRBY. But the RECORD does not show in those cases that there were only 17 Senators here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well; on the next vote there may be a quorum here. However, if anyone wants to suggest the absence of a quorum, of course the Chair will order the Secretary to call the roll.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to suggest the absence of a quorum, but I do not want this vote to be appealed to in the future as a precedent that 17 Senators can pass an amendment, 12 for and 5 against. I say now, for the RECORD, that there is not a quorum present, and it is very doubtful whether we could get one to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state frankly to the Senate that the object of the Chair is, as far as he can, to put an end to the practice of deceiving the public by stating that a matter is carried, when the figures handed to the Chair by the clerks at the desk show that there was no quorum present. The Chair does not care to participate in that system of deception.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I still contend that the vote does not show that there is no quorum present. It shows that there was no quorum voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is all.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Chair entirely. I think the Chair has done right in announcing the vote. There has not been any official determination yet that there is no quorum here.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, it seems to me, since all the discussion here discloses that no one thinks there is a quorum present, and as the vote as counted shows that there is not a quorum present, it ought to be ascertained whether there is a quorum present, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the vote did not show the absence of a quorum. It showed that a quorum had not voted. There is no rule or law which requires a quorum to vote. The presumption is that a quorum is present unless the contrary is shown. The Senator from Arkansas suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Glass	Lenroot	Sutherland
Brandegee	Gore	McNary	Swanson
Calder	Gronna	Norris	Thomas
Capper	Hale	Nugent	Townsend
Chamberlain	Harris	Overman	Trammell
Culberson	Harrison	Phelan	Underwood
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	Kendrick	Sheppard	Warren
Dillingham	Kenyon	Smoot
Fernald	Keyes	Spencer
Gay	Kirby	Stanley

Mr. SWANSON. The senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], and the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] are detained on official business.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. MCNARY. I announce the absence of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] on account of illness in his family.

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] on account of illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

I also announce the absence of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] on account of a death in his family. I make this announcement for the day.

I also desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] on official business.

Mr. DIAL. My colleague, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], is detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum of the Senate present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Assistant Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BORAH and Mr. PAGE answered to their names when called.

Mr. SIMMONS entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is not present.

Mr. GRONNA. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. KIRBY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. MYERS entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

After a little delay,

Mr. GRONNA. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 26, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 25, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, impart unto us grace, strength, that we may cast out the demons—selfishness, greed, covetousness, jealousy, hatred, revenge—that brood of vipers which enter by stealth into the soul of man, to corrupt and despoil it; that the angels of honesty, integrity, purity, justice, mercy, generosity, brotherly love may enter in, sweep the house, garnish it, and thus make it a fit dwelling place for the holy spirit of truth; that the world may be a safe dwelling place for Thy children. Under the spiritual leadership of Thy son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

UNITED STATES TROOPS IN GERMANY.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up a privileged resolution that has been favorably reported by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 500.

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the House of the exact status of the American military forces now stationed in German territory; the scope to which their operations are confined under the terms of the armistice between the allied nations, the Government of the United States, and Germany; the extent of the authority exercised over them by Field Marshal Ferdinand Foch, commander in chief of the allied forces in the occupied Rhine Provinces, and how far their activities may be directed without express orders from the President of the United States.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I am informed by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], that the Secretary of War informs him that there is no objection on the part of the War Department to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. DENT. I stated the substance of the resolution to the Secretary over the telephone yesterday afternoon, and he said he had not read the resolution, but from my statement of it the War Department had no objection to giving that information.

Mr. KAHN. I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from North Carolina rise?

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table.

Mr. RAMSEYER. When—to-day?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] be allowed to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. On what subject?

Mr. KITCHIN. A right interesting subject—not a partisan matter at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the ultimate consumer and the effect of certain legislation already enacted and proposed upon the ultimate consumer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the effect of legislation on the ultimate consumer. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, is this the gentleman's remarks or a lot of editorials and newspaper views?

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. It will be my own remarks. I may possibly quote very briefly, but not at any length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Sells pension bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Sells pension bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Senate resolution 341.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. WILLIAM J. BROWNING, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey.

Resolved, That a committee of six Senators be appointed by the presiding officer to join the committee appointed by the House of Representatives to take order for the superintending of the funeral of Mr. BROWNING at Camden, N. J.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

And that in compliance with the second resolution the President pro tempore had appointed Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. EDGE, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. HARRIS, and Mr. GAY as the committee on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (S. 2085) relating to the maintenance of actions for death on the high seas and other navigable waters, the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out on page 2, line 15, of the engrossed bill the word "fault" and insert "default" in lieu thereof.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House joint resolution 316, relating to the supervision of the Lincoln Memorial.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the RECORD of March 13, 1920. On page 4299 an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH]. The RECORD shows that the amendment was agreed to. It should show that it was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the RECORD will be corrected.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The statement which the gentleman now makes goes into this RECORD, but if the RECORD of that date is already printed, it can not be corrected there.

Mr. KAHN. It generally takes about 10 days, and I understand that they are not right up to time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Years ago we had to hand in these changes for the permanent RECORD within 8 or 10 days. Then they got so that they strung it out to three or four or five weeks. Now, what is the rule about it?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They will make changes in the permanent RECORD at any time before the permanent RECORD is printed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but when is that?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That depends on the Printing Office. They were delayed, I think, during the special session of Congress, but when this matter came up here recently the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS], chairman of the Committee on Printing, made an inquiry at the Printing Office as to how nearly the permanent RECORD was down to date, and, as I recall, he was told at that time that it was up to within about 10 days.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Within the last month or so permission has been obtained to correct the permanent RECORD a month or two after the thing happened.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They got permission here recently to correct the RECORD, I think, of last December, with the proviso that it should not require a reprinting of the RECORD, which ended the correction.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There ought to be some rule about it.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes immediately after the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], the subject being some resolutions adopted by the American Legion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes on the subject of some resolutions adopted by the American Legion. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDMONDS. Reserving the right to object, to-day was set apart for bills on the Private Calendar. If it is to be taken up by speeches, there is no use in making a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The unanimous-consent agreement has already been made and the gentleman from Mississippi has leave to speak for 30 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have asked for leave to speak for 10 minutes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I am not going to object to this, but I shall object to any other requests.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

PRESIDENTIAL THIRD TERM.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, on September 14, 1874, there appeared in the New York Daily Tribune an article under the caption "The American Rubicon," from which I quote the following excerpt:

From present indications the time is rapidly approaching when the people of the United States will have to decide whether, under any conceivable circumstances, they would be willing to confer the office of President for more than two terms upon anyone, and whether an unbroken usage of nearly a century, having its origin in the august example of Washington, has established a precedent which has or has not acquired the moral authority of a constitutional provision.

Several presses, and some politicians of local influence, have already begun to agitate the renomination of President Grant, and no indication has thus far reached the public from any authoritative quarter that a reelection would be otherwise than agreeable to him.

As President Grant is the first Chief Magistrate of this country who has held the presidential office for two terms, and allowed the public to believe that a third nomination would be agreeable to him, the question for the American people is practically a new one, the responsibility for deciding which will for the first time rest entirely with themselves.

As it is a question which in certain aspects involves all that distinguishes ours from a dynastic government, it is obviously our duty to meet it with deliberate firmness and promptitude that would be due to any proposal that contemplated a fundamental change in the form and policy of our political institutions.

The question of a second reelection turns upon entirely different considerations from those which control the question of a first reelection. It is not so much whether the incumbent's mode of administering the Government is acceptable to the people, but rather whether it would be prudent to confide to any Chief Magistrate more power and influence than could accumulate in his hands in the course of two consecutive terms.

As this question has much wider bearings than is commonly supposed, the serious discussion of it can no longer be considered premature. In the contribution which we propose to make to this debate there will be no question of persons. The considerations we shall offer will have just as much or just as little force with one candidate as with another. We shall not ask whether Gen. Grant should be reelected, but whether any man, however popular and capable, should be elevated to the Chief Magistracy of this country for more than two consecutive terms.

There is much in this article which suggests the situation confronting us to-day. So far as I am advised, President Wilson has not stated that he would not be a candidate for a third term, nor have his closest political friends been forbidden to urge that course when the delegates shall have been chosen to the Democratic convention to nominate his successor.

It is true, however, as it was when the article just quoted was written, that "several presses, and some politicians of local influence, have already begun to agitate" his renomination.

It has been customary heretofore for Presidents elected to a second term to indicate far in advance their fixed determination not to offer for a third election. The most recent instances of this were the announcements of President McKinley and Col. Roosevelt.

Mr. McKinley was inaugurated the second time on March 4, 1901. Few men had ever enjoyed a wider popularity than he, and the suggestion that he would be elected for a third term began to appear early in his second administration.

On the 10th of June, 1901, he gave out a statement directly to the people, saying:

I regret that the suggestion of a third term has been made. I doubt whether I am called upon to give to it notice, but there are new questions of the gravest importance before the administration and the country, and their just consideration should not be prejudiced in the public mind by even the suspicion of the thought of a third term.

In view, therefore, of the reiteration of the suggestion of it, I will now say, once for all, expressing a long-settled conviction, that I not only am not and will not be a candidate for a third term, but I would not accept a nomination for it if it were tendered to me.

[Applause.]

My only ambition is to serve through my second term to the acceptance of my countrymen, whose generous confidence I so deeply appreciate, and then with them to do my duty in the ranks of private citizenship.

In the campaign of 1904 it was charged on the stump generally, and in the press by those who opposed the election of Col. Roosevelt, that so vaulting was his ambition that if elected to the Presidency he would set aside all precedent and endeavor to seat himself so sure that he could not be defeated for a third term.

This argument was urged with such earnestness and persistency that during the campaign he was advised, and the advice was insisted upon by his party leaders, to make a public statement renouncing any such intention. This he refused to do.

His election was so overwhelming that the result was known early in the evening of election day and before midnight he issued the following statement:

On the 4th of March, next, I shall have served three and one-half years, and this three and one-half years constitutes my first term. The wise custom which limits Presidents to two terms regards the substance and not the form, and under no circumstances will I be a candidate for or accept another nomination.

[Applause.]

True it is that in 1912 he did become a candidate and undertook to interpret his very lucid and unequivocal election-night statement as meaning that he would not accept the nomination for a third consecutive term.

It must be clear—

He said—

to any reasonable man that the precedent which forbids a third term has reference only to a third consecutive term. It grew out of the fact that a President of the United States under the present convention system of electing delegates can, if he knows how to use the machinery at his disposal, renominate himself, even though the majority of his party is against him. But after he has been out of office for a term he has lost control of that machinery. He is in the position absolutely of any private citizen. The machinery is then in the hands of the man occupying the office of President.

His friend, the Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott, further explained the apparent inconsistency in Mr. Roosevelt's action in this wise:

When a man says at breakfast in the morning, "No, thank you; I will not take any more coffee," it does not mean that he will not take any more coffee to-morrow morning or next week or next month or next year.

[Laughter.]

However this may be, the fact remains that he announced on the day he was elected to the second term that under no circumstances would he be a candidate for or accept another nomination.

I am a Democrat. I have supported the measures of the Wilson administration during the past seven years as loyally as any man in this House.

I believe that the accomplishments of his administration under his great leadership will secure for him a place high on the roll of our great Presidents. [Applause.]

I regret, therefore, all the more that he has remained silent as to his intentions in the matter of the third term, and that he has permitted so many of his friends, including members of his own Cabinet, to advocate publicly his reelection to a third term and, by remaining silent, allowed the country to believe that he was willing to break the ancient precedent.

He has written much of the history and political structure of our Government, has commented freely on the character and make-up of its coordinate branches, but, so far as I have been able to discover, he has never intimated in any of his books that he subscribed to the principle, taught by most of the fathers, of the ineligibility of the President to a third election.

In his book on Congressional Government, for instance, he says:

The business of the President, occasionally great, is usually not much above routine. Most of the time it is mere administration, mere obedience of directions from the masters of policy, the standing committees. Except in so far as his power of veto constitutes him a part of the Legislature, the President might not inconveniently be a permanent officer, the first official of a carefully graded and impartially regulated civil-service system, through whose sure series of merit promotions the youngest clerk might rise even to the Chief Magistracy.

In another place he says:

Administration is something that men must learn, not something to skill in which they are born. Americans take to business of all kinds more naturally than any other nation ever did, and the executive duties of government constitute just an exalted kind of business; but even Americans are not Presidents in their cradles. One can not have too much preparatory training and experience who is to fill so high a magistracy. It is difficult to perceive, therefore, upon what safe ground of reason are built the opinions of those persons who regard short terms of service as sacredly and peculiarly republican in principle. If republicanism is founded upon good sense, nothing so far removed from good sense can be part and parcel of it. Efficiency is the only just foundation for confidence in a public officer under republican institutions no less than under monarchs; and short terms which cut off the efficient as surely and inexorably as the inefficient are quite as repugnant to republican as to monarchical rules of wisdom. Unhappily, however, this is not American doctrine.

I think it will be interesting to note what a very different view of this subject, both in preachment and in practice, was taken by the fathers who founded the Republic and set it upon its feet.

When the convention which framed the more perfect Union met in Philadelphia, one of the most, if not the most, important and vexing question which was presented related to the Chief Magistracy. Many suggestions were made and discussed, with the final result that one Chief Magistrate was agreed upon, whose "style shall be 'President of the United States,' and his title shall be 'His Excellency.'"

Several methods for his selection were suggested, debated, and voted upon. First, that he should be elected by the people; second, that he should be appointed by either electors chosen for that purpose or by the State legislatures; third, that he should be chosen by the National Legislature or by the Senate.

After much debate it was decided that he be chosen by the legislature, and his term of office was fixed at seven years, and that he should be ineligible for reelection.

Much opposition developed in the convention later on to having the President selected by the legislators, and the whole matter was reconsidered and referred to a special committee. The final result was the adoption of the electoral-college system, and the term was fixed at four years, but with no restriction as to reeligibility. This was a compromise.

Alexander Hamilton believed that the President should serve for life or during good behavior. Others insisted that his term should be limited and that he should not be elected a second time.

The compromise was stated by Jefferson thus:

My opinion originally was that the President of the United States should have been elected for seven years and forever ineligible afterwards. I have since become sensible that seven years is too long to be irremovable and that there should be a peaceable way of withdrawing a man in midway who is doing wrong. The service for eight years, with a power to remove at the end of the first four, comes nearly to my principle as corrected by experience.

Lafayette was very much disappointed that the ineligibility for reelection had not been placed in the Constitution and was fearful that some ambitious man might by successive reelections finally convert the Government into a real monarchy.

In a letter to him dated April 28, 1788, Washington said:

Guarded so effectually as the proposed Constitution is in respect to the prevention of bribery and undue influence in the choice of President, I confess I differ widely myself from Mr. Jefferson and you as to the expediency or necessity of rotation in that appointment.

The matter was fairly discussed in the convention, and to my full conviction, under an extended view of this part of the subject, I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the services of any man who, in some great emergency, shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public.

Let us keep in mind clearly just what it was that he differed widely from Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Lafayette about. They favored a single term of six or seven years and ineligibility forever after. There was no discussion as to a third election. Washington's course thereafter shows clearly that he thought one term was sufficient unless a great emergency demanded that another term be allowed.

The great emergency did, as a matter of fact, arise in his first term, and he was "deemed universally most capable of serving the public" for another four-year term, but he refused flatly even to consider a third term despite the great emergency which still remained.

The letter to Lafayette and the circumstance that in Washington's Farewell Address opposition to the principle of a third term is not cited as one of the reasons which impelled him to retire have been made the basis of extended arguments by those who from time to time have taken issue with this old tradition.

It may not be inappropriate, therefore, to examine somewhat the genesis of this great document.

During Washington's first administration he determined not to be a candidate for reelection. Mr. Madison states that in conversation with him Washington said:

He had forborne to communicate his intentions to any other persons whatever but Mr. Jefferson, Col. Hamilton, Gen. Knox, and myself, and of late to Mr. Randolph. Col. Hamilton and Gen. Knox, he observed, were extremely importunate that he should relinquish his purpose, and had made pressing representations to induce him to it.

Mr. Jefferson had expressed his wishes to the like effect. He had not, however, persuaded himself that his continuance in public life could be of so much necessity or importance as was conceived, and his disinclination to it was becoming every day more and more fixed, so that he wished to make up his mind as soon as possible on the points he had mentioned.

What he desired was to prefer that mode which would be most remote from the appearance of arrogantly presuming on his reelection in case he should not withdraw himself, and such a time as would be most convenient to the public in making the choice of his successor.

Some days after this Washington and Madison met on the road between Mount Vernon and Philadelphia, when Washington again renewed the subject, and gave him a letter setting out his views in brief on the subjects which this Farewell Address should contain. Among other things, this letter contained the following:

I will without apology desire, if the measure itself should strike you as proper or likely to produce public good or private honor, that you would turn your thoughts to a valedictory address from me to the public, expressing in plain and modest terms that, having been honored with the presidential chair and to the best of my abilities contributed to the organization and administration of the Government; that having arrived at a period of life when the private walks of it in the shades of retirement become necessary and will be most pleasing to me (and as the spirit of the Government may render a rotation in the elective officers of it more congenial with the ideas (the people have) of liberty and safety), that I take my leave of them as a public man.

Complying with this request, Madison prepared a text for the address, following the lines mapped out by Washington in his conversations with him and in the letter above quoted. The paragraph in Washington's memoranda that "the spirit of the Government may render a rotation more congenial with the ideas of liberty," and so forth, as rewritten by Madison, was in these words:

May I be allowed, further, to add as a consideration far more important, that an early example of rotation in an office of so high and delicate a nature may equally accord with the republican spirit of our Constitution and the ideas of liberty and safety entertained by the people.

Had he not been persuaded that a great emergency demanded his further continuance in office, the address would have been published in 1792, and these words would undoubtedly have been in it.

During the first years of his second term there were sharp divisions in the Cabinet, as well as among his lifelong friends and compatriots, who with him had won our independence and ordained and established the more perfect Union.

His relations with Madison, we are told, were not quite so cordial and intimate as formerly, whereas the friendship and most cordial relations with Hamilton had grown stronger. The draft of the Farewell Address which Madison had originally prepared was this time submitted to Hamilton with sundry notations and with the request that he put it all into proper shape for publication. Hamilton was of those—perhaps I may say was the leader of those—who preferred that the Executive should hold his office for life, and to this fact is uniformly attributed the omission of the words in the Madison draft relating to rotation in the Presidency.

Some 25 or 30 years after this there was much public discussion as to the real authorship of the Farewell Address. In a letter written by Madison to Jefferson in 1823, he expressed much regret that the question of Washington's authorship of the Farewell Address had been raised. He feared, in spite of the fact that it was all Washington's except the mere matter of phraseology, the public might lessen somewhat their reverence for it by the mere discovery that it was even in that slight particular "the performance of another held in different estimation."

Referring evidently to the omission of the sentence which related to rotation in the President's office, he said:

At some future day it may be an object with the curious to compare the two drafts, made at different epochs, with each other, and the letters of Gen. Washington with both. The comparison will show a greater conformity in the first with the tenor and tone of the letter than in the other; and the difference will be more remarkable perhaps in what is omitted than in what is addded in the address as it stands.

A reply to the Farewell Address was adopted by the House of Representatives, and for the present purpose it will suffice to quote only one passage:

Yet we can not be unmindful that your moderation and magnanimity, twice displayed by retiring from your exalted stations, afford examples no less rare and instructive to mankind than valuable to a Republic.

The resolutions adopted by the Senate upon the same occasion concluded in these words:

The most effectual consolation that can offer for the loss we are about to sustain arises from the animating reflection that the influence of your example will extend to your successors, and the United States thus continue to enjoy an able, upright, and energetic administration.

It is quite apparent from the foregoing that Washington was in thorough accord with those who held that rotation in the presidential office was a part of the spirit, though not the letter, of the Constitution, and the tenor of the addresses of the House and Senate demonstrates quite clearly that they, too, concurred in that view.

Nothing but "a great emergency" when some exceptional man should "be deemed universally most capable of serving the public" could, in Washington's opinion, justify the exception.

Had that great emergency arisen? No greater man has appeared in all our history than Washington, and, in my opinion, none so truly great, and certainly none more modest. The fact that it was universally conceded that Washington would be called upon to act as the first Executive was a most potent influence in determining the convention to agree to the proposal to have one Chief Executive.

An experiment was to be made in self-government, an effort to demonstrate, if possible, that a republic "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal could long endure."

Believing, as he had stated in his letter to Madison, that the spirit of the Government might render rotation in the elective officers of it more congenial with the ideas of liberty and safety, his modesty forbade him to assume that he was "deemed universally most capable of serving the public," if in deed and in truth a great emergency really existed.

In Europe the opinion was very general among all statesmen that our republican experiment would be short-lived. All previous history clearly justified that belief, and the thinking men of our own country awaited the test of the experiment with much anxiety.

A very interesting letter, which throws light on this subject, appears in Washington's published correspondence from the Rev. William Gordon, an English clergyman, at one time Chaplain of the Provisional Congress and author of "A History of the Rise, Progress, and Establishment of the Independence of the United States of America." In that letter he says:

There is a prevailing idea in Great Britain, if not in other parts of Europe, that whenever you are removed the Federal Union will be dissolved, the States will separate, and disorder succeed, for that the American Government can not, in its own nature, be lasting. The confusions in France and the eccentric publications in the United States tend to strengthen the idea. I am fully convinced from what I have read in the manuscripts you possess that nothing will give you greater satisfaction than being the means of disappointing such expectations. Some conjecture that when you have been removed from these lower regions (may it be to the regions of perpetual bliss), for a few years the States will quarrel about who shall be President, and thereby produce a separation. I am fully convinced that one, if not more, of the first persons of the United States is of opinion that, in time, an hereditary President must be chosen to prevent the dangerous contests that periodical elections will produce, similar to what has happened repeatedly in choosing Polish sovereigns. An hereditary President will become, most probably, in a series of years, but another name for an hereditary monarchy, and the whole spirit of government be changed into European, Asiatic, or African, whatever may be its bodily shape. Allow me, then, to ask your opinion whether the following plan might not, if brought into execution, be preventive of such a deplorable event.

The plan which he suggested was that the President should be selected from each of the States alternately. Before the time for holding the second election came the most convincing proof that a great emergency had arisen and that Washington was "deemed universally most capable of serving the public" can best be demonstrated by reading extracts from some of the letters which were written to him by those for whose opinion we must have the greatest respect.

Jefferson, who had originally been most insistent upon limiting the presidential term to a fixed period, with ineligibility for reelection, wrote as follows:

When you first mentioned to me your purpose of retiring from the Government, though I felt all the magnitude of the event, I was in a considerable degree silent. I knew that, to such a mind as yours, persuasion was idle and impertinent; that before forming your decision you had weighed all the reasons for and against the measure, had made up your mind in full view of the result. Pursuing my reflections, too, I knew we were some day to try to walk alone, and if the essay should be made while you should be alive and looking on we would derive confidence from that circumstance and resource if it failed. The public mind, too, was calm and confident, and therefore in a favorable state for making the experiment. Had no change of circumstances intervened, I should not with any hopes of success have now ventured to propose to you a change of purpose. But the public mind is no longer confident and serene; and that from causes in which you are no ways personally mixed. Though these causes have been hackneyed in the public papers in detail, it may not be amiss, in order to calculate the effect they are capable of producing, to take a view of them in the mass, giving to each the form, real or imaginary, under which they have been presented.

After enumerating these causes he continues:

The confidence of the whole Union is centered in you. Your being at the helm will be more than an answer to every argument which can be used to alarm and lead the people in any quarter into violence and secession. North and South will hang together if they have you to hang on; and if the first correction of a numerous representation should fail in its effect, your presence will give time for trying others not inconsistent with the union and peace of the States.

I am perfectly aware of the oppression under which your present office lays your mind and of the ardor with which you pant for domestic life. But there is sometimes an eminence of character on which society has such peculiar claims as to control the predilections of the individual for a particular walk of happiness, and restrain him to that alone arising from the present and future benedictions of mankind. This seems to be your condition, and the law imposed on you by Providence in forming your character and fashioning the events on which it was to operate; and it is to motives like these, and not to personal anxieties of mine or others who have no right to call on you for sacrifices, that I appeal and urge a revisal of it, on the ground of change in the aspect of things. Should an honest majority result from the new and enlarged representation, should those acquiesce whose principles or interest they may control, your wishes for retirement would be gratified with less danger, as soon as that shall be manifest, without awaiting the completion of the second period of four years. One or two sessions will determine the crisis, and I can not but hope that you can resolve to add more to the many years you have already sacrificed to the good of mankind.

It was natural, of course, that Gen. Hamilton would insist upon Washington serving another term. He had none of Jefferson's misgivings, but the reasons which he sets out in his letter are well worth considering:

That the affairs of the National Government are not yet firmly established; that its enemies, generally speaking, are as inveterate as ever; that their enmity has been sharpened by its success and by all the resentments which flow from disappointed predictions and mortified vanity; that a general and strenuous effort is making in every State to place the administration of it in the hands of its enemies, as if they were its safest guardians; that the period of the next House of Representatives is likely to prove the crisis of its permanent character; that if you continue in office nothing materially mischievous is to be apprehended; if you quit, much is to be dreaded; that the same motives which induced you to accept originally ought to decide you to continue till matters have assumed a more determinate aspect; that, indeed, it would have been better, as regards your own character, that you had never consented to come forward than now to leave the business unfinished and in danger of being undone; that in the event of storms arising there would be an imputation either of want of foresight or want of firmness; and, in fine, that on public and personal accounts, on patriotic and prudential considerations, the clear path to be pursued by you will be again to obey the voice of your country, which it is not doubted will be as earnest and unanimous as ever.

Mr. Randolph, the Attorney General, was apparently more excited than the others. He expressed his protest against Washington's retirement in these words:

The Constitution would not have been adopted but from a knowledge that you had once sanctioned it, and an expectation that you would execute it. It is in a state of probation. The most inauspicious struggles are passed; but the public deliberations need stability. Should a civil war arise you can not stay at home, and how much easier will it be to disperse the factions which are rushing to this catastrophe than to subdue them after they shall appear in armies!

Gouverneur Morris, who believed that the term of the Executive should not have been limited at all, wrote as follows:

As to your reacceptance, sir, you know my sentiments, which, on that, as on some other subjects, are, I think, unchangeable. It will be time enough for you to have a successor when it shall please God to call you from this world's theater. If such successor is then able to fill the President's chair, it will be matter of surprise to those who can form a competent idea of the office; but during your life I consider the thing as utterly impossible. And do not imagine, my dear sir, that you can retire, though you may resign. You will, in such case, become the man of the opposition. However your good sense may differ from their madness, and your virtue from their villainy, depend on it they will cite you as being of their sentiment. If you are silent, you assent; and if you speak, you are committed. In the meantime, your poor successor is obliged to struggle under all the weight of your reputation, as well as that of the office. And he must be a strong man who can carry either; of course, a very rash man who would attempt to take up both.

Aside from the reasons assigned by these statesmen, the situation as we glean it from our histories constituted a very great emergency.

The reprehensible conduct of "Citizen Genet" had added greatly to our already embarrassing relations with England and France, and the always perplexing and ever ominous situation in the Mississippi Valley, where the free navigation of the river was in the opinions of the settlers even paramount to the preservation of the Union, was a constant menace to our peace with Spain.

Only a few years before, when Jay had suggested what concessions might be demanded by Spain as a prerequisite to any treaty, a veritable fire of indignation swept the whole western country.

News traveled slowly in those days, and rumors grew into frightful realities in proportion to the distance traveled.

It was the firm conviction of the settlers beyond the mountains that an agreement had been reached whereby the navigation of the river had been closed for 20 years.

No less a personage than John Rogers Clark had organized a military force with the express determination of waging war on all the Spanish settlements throughout the valley, and the separation of the transmountain country from the United States was openly and quite generally advocated.

In his life of Washington, Woodrow Wilson, explaining why Washington abandoned his intention of retiring at the end of his first administration, says:

It was his clear perception what the danger would be should America be drawn into the gathering European wars that had led him to accept a second term as President. It had been his wish to remain only four years in the arduous office; but he had no thought to leave a task unfinished; knew that he was in the very midst of the critical business of holding the country to the course which should make it a self-respecting Nation.

These were the circumstances under which Washington yielded to the unanimous wish of his countrymen and consented to serve for a second term, and I think all will agree that in truth and in fact "a great emergency" had arisen.

THE THIRD TERM.

The same influences were brought to bear on him to induce him to remain in the Presidency which had succeeded in persuading him to accept the second election, and it is quite certain, if we may accept the testimony of his compatriots, that he could have received a third term as he had the first and the second, by the unanimous vote of the electors.

In his "Life of Washington," John Marshall, the great Chief Justice, says:

Already the determination of his fellow citizens had been unequivocally manifested, and it was believed to be apparent that the election would be unanimous when he announced his resolution to withdraw from the honors and toils of office.

It is equally true that had he so desired, "the posture of public affairs," as the expression ran, could easily have justified the claim that a great emergency demanded his further retention of the office.

The war clouds of Europe were again threatening to break over us and to involve us in hostilities with one or the other of the belligerents.

The question of the free navigation of the Mississippi River was still unsettled.

It was not until October 27, 1795, that Pinckney had concluded the treaty of San Lorenzoet Real, by the terms of which navigation of the Mississippi River was to be free to our citizens of the upper valley, but the corollary and the necessary privilege of deposit and export at New Orleans was limited by the treaty to three years, and the flame of threatened war or insurrection was liable to blaze up again.

The Jay treaty with England in 1796 had disturbed the peace of the country as nothing else had done. In his Hundred Years of American Diplomacy, Mr. Foster says:

The question of its ratification precipitated the most dangerous crisis through which the country has passed up to the Civil War. Of this crisis John Quincy Adams has said, "it brought on the severest trial which the character of Washington and the fortunes of our country have ever passed through. No period of the War of Independence, no other emergency of our history since its close, not even the ordeal of establishing the Constitution, * * * has convulsed to its inmost fibers the political associations of the North American people with such excruciating agonies as the consummation and fulfillment of the great national composition of the conflicting rights, interests, and pretensions of this country and Great Britain."

How few men in all the world's history, under such inviting circumstances, would have set aside the proffered crown.

No hour so meet, no time so apt, had ever before or has ever since presented so great a temptation, and this world will not endure long enough for the lovers of liberty everywhere to forget to point to Washington's action as the high tide of patriotic and self-effacing abnegation. Small wonder he was "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

In all the years of our history since that great day no man has been permitted to cross that Rubicon, and may our children's children in all the years to come be able to boast this same unbroken precedent.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

The name of Thomas Jefferson is still, thank God, a name to conjure with. The seekers after liberty still read his writings for guidance and direction. [Applause.] He was and is and will continue to be "The philosopher of democracy."

I have already quoted from a letter which he wrote to his friend, J. Taylor, on the 6th of January, 1785, then upon the very threshold of his second term. I will quote further:

The danger is that the indulgence and attachments of the people will keep a man in the chair after he becomes a dotard, that reelections through life shall become habitual, and election for life follow that. Gen. Washington set the example of voluntary retirement after eight years. I shall follow it. And a few more precedents will oppose the obstacle of habit to anyone after a while who shall endeavor to extend his term. Perhaps it may beget a disposition to establish it by an amendment of the Constitution. I believe I am doing right, therefore, in pursuing my principle. I had determined to declare my intention, but I have consented to be silent on the opinion of friends, who think it best not to put a continuance out of my power in defiance of all circumstances. There is, however, but one circumstance which could engage my acquiescence in another election, to wit, such a division about a successor as might bring in a monarchist. But that circumstance is impossible.

It will be noted in this letter that Jefferson also recognizes one emergency which could justify a candidacy for a third term:

Such a division about a successor as might bring in a monarchist. But—

He adds, well and wisely—

that circumstance is impossible.

In a letter written to Mr. Weaver June 7, 1807, he says:

That I should lay down my charge at a proper season is as much a duty as to have borne it faithfully.

[Applause.]

What a splendid soul-inspiring sentiment!

He continues:

That there are in our country a great number of characters entirely equal to the management of its affairs can not be doubted. Many of them, indeed, have not had opportunities of making themselves known to their fellow citizens; but many have had, and the only difficulty will be to choose among them. These changes are necessary, too, for the security of republican government. If some period be not fixed, either by the Constitution or by practice, to the services of the First Magistrate, his office, though nominally elective, will, in fact, be for life, and that will soon degenerate into an inheritance.

The statement "That there are in our country a great number of characters entirely equal to the management of its affairs" is exactly the thought expressed in different words by Cassius when he exclaimed:

When went there by an age since the great flood
But it was famed with more than with one man?
When could they say till now, that talked of Rome
That her wide walls encompassed but one man?

[Applause.]

When the time comes when the citizenship of this Republic has so degenerated in all the attributes requisite to the uses and purposes of the Republic that we are limited in our choice of a Chief Executive to "one only man," then the day for our judgment is at hand. [Applause.]

When the end of Jefferson's second term was approaching the situation of the country was again such as an ambitious man might easily interpret to be "the great emergency" mentioned by Washington.

Europe was in a perfect maelstrom. The man on horseback was abroad in every land. We were a small people far away in the wildernesses of America, struggling earnestly to establish the truth of our declaration that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

We neither had the good will nor the serious respect of any crowned head in Europe. They did not believe that any democracy could defend itself. They did not believe that any chief executive was worthy of consideration who had not waded through slaughter to his throne.

England, by her orders in council, had forbidden our merchant ships to land at any port of France. Napoleon had proclaimed a paper blockade of the British Isles, and between the two our ships were denied the right to sail the seas. If we undertook commerce with France or Great Britain, between this upper and nether millstone we were to be crushed. Our flag was insulted upon every sea. Our ships were boarded and our sailors pressed into the service of our bullying tormentors.

Our ship of war Chesapeake had been attacked at our very doors by His Majesty's ship Leopard and a part of her crew forced ignominiously into the service of England.

In a desperate though ultimately unsuccessful effort to keep our country out of the war, which was shaking the very foundations of all Europe, Mr. Jefferson resorted to the embargo. This simply saved our enemies the trouble of driving us off the seas.

The internal affairs of the country were in a most unhappy state; actual dissolution of the Union was threatened.

Early in 1808 John Quincy Adams told Mr. Jefferson "that there was a plan afoot in New England to nullify the embargo and defeat the laws, and that secession, it might be, and union or at least alliance with England would follow."

The troubles which faced us then, the dangers which beset our path and threatened the very life of our new experiment in liberty, differed from the present both in kind and in degree and were infinitely more ominous. Yet Mr. Jefferson did not doubt "that there were in our country a great number of characters entirely equal to the management of our affairs."

Nor was there any lack of evidence of a public demand for his continued service. In the fall of 1806 the Vermont Legislature passed a resolution expressing its deliberate wish that Mr. Jefferson would permit the use of his name as a candidate for a second reelection. In reply to this he wrote:

Believing that a representative government, responsible at short periods of election, is that which produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind, I feel it a duty to do no act which shall essentially impair that principle, and I should unwillingly be the person who, disregarding the sound precedent set by an illustrious predecessor, should furnish the first example of prolongation beyond the second term of office.

Similar resolutions were passed by a number of States—Maryland, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, Georgia, and North Carolina. Oh! The air was full of voices! [Applause.] In addition to these, the Society of Baptists of the Appomattox Association of Virginia addressed him a letter and urged him to consent to serve for a third term. In response to this very pressing letter, he replied as follows:

Believing that a definite period of retiring from this station will tend materially to secure our elective form of government, and sensible, too, of that decline which advancing years bring on, I have felt it a duty to withdraw at the close of my present term of office and to strengthen by practice a principle which I deem salutary.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi may proceed for 10 minutes—until he concludes his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to conclude his remarks——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We ought to fix the time definitely.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask that the gentleman continue for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi may proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It would be as tedious as it is unnecessary to undertake to quote further from Mr. Jefferson. He believed, as in fact most of his compeers seemed to believe, and as I now verily believe, that to extend the term beyond one reelection would, in effect, be to elect the President for life, and that would mean the end of liberty as we understand it.

The Book says, "The fear of God is the beginning of wisdom." Jefferson believed, as all Democrats must believe, that the fear of power is the beginning of liberty. [Applause.]

ANDREW JACKSON.

In 1828 another great American came into the Presidency, one of the choice and master spirits of the age; a man who loved liberty and had fought for it; who hated monarchical government and had fought against it; a soldier, a statesman, whose passion was patriotism—Andrew Jackson. [Applause.]

Jackson believed that he had been cheated out of the Presidency in 1824. He believed, with much good reason, that he was the choice of the people at that time. He believed as fervently, though perhaps with less reason, that his defeat had been accomplished through "bargain and corruption." He believed also most firmly in the precedent which Washington and Jefferson had set him, but he was not willing to leave that question open.

In his first message to Congress he said:

I would therefore recommend such an amendment of the Constitution as may remove all intermediate agency in the election of the President and Vice President. The mode may be so regulated as to preserve to each State its present relative weight in the election, and a failure in the first attempt may be provided for by confining the second choice between the two highest candidates. In connection with such an amendment it would seem advisable to limit the service of the Chief Magistrate to a single term of either four or six years.

And for eight years thereafter in every one of his annual messages he repeated that recommendation.

In his last annual message he reminds the Congress of his theretofore reiterated suggestion that the Constitution should be amended so as to limit the term to one of either four or six years, and concludes with these words:

All history tells us that a free people should be watchful of delegated power and should never acquiesce in a practice which should diminish their control over it. This obligation, so universal in its application to all the principles of a Republic, is peculiarly so in ours, when the formation of parties founded on sectional interests is so much fostered by the extent of our territory. These interests represented by candidates for the Presidency are constantly prone in the zeal of party and selfish objects to generate influences unmindful of the general good and forgetful of the restraints which the great body of the people would enforce if they were in no contingency to lose the right of expressing their will. The experience of our country from the formation of the Government to the present day demonstrates that the people can not too soon adopt some stronger safeguard for their right to elect their highest officers known to the Constitution than is contained in that sacred instrument as it now stands.

LINCOLN.

The temptation never came to another President until Lincoln was elected to his second term. Unfortunately he was removed from the scenes of his earthly activities a few weeks after his second inauguration.

I do not believe that Lincoln's heart could ever have entertained for a moment the suggestion that he should attempt the overthrow of this palladium of our liberties. It is unthinkable that the voice which spoke the immortal words at Gettysburg could ever have been tempted into an utterance which runs so counter to all the spirit of our institutions and jangles so harshly out of tune with the teachings of the fathers. [Applause.]

GRANT.

I am not familiar with the circumstances mentioned in the Tribune article, from which I have already quoted, touching Gen. Grant's willingness to continue in office for a third term. I do not doubt that great pressure was brought upon him to permit the use of his name. There were many selfish interests in that particular time which were deeply concerned in retaining the dominant party in power. In addition to that, Gen. Grant was a popular military hero. He had saved the Union on the battle field, and the soldiers of his armies were dominant in the politics of the country. There can be no doubt that thousands of those who had followed his lead on so many battle fields were unwilling to see him retire from the great office to which their favor had appointed him.

The period immediately following the Civil War is frequently referred to by political historians as "the rule of the major generals." This is just another way of expressing the recognized fact of the dominance of our politics by the military, or rather soldier, element.

It will be interesting, however, to note that even under such circumstances the House of Representatives, on the 15th of December, 1875, representing, as they did, constituencies influenced largely, if not indeed controlled, by the ex-soldiers of the Union Army, by a vote of 233 to 18 adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this House the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the presidential office after their second term has become, by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom will be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions.

In 1880 Gen. Grant was a candidate for the Republican nomination. He was championed by no less a personage than Roscoe Conkling, then at the height of his power in the councils of his party. A new doctrine was then advanced—that the old principle related only to three successive terms, just as Col. Roosevelt interpreted it later on.

I think no one would challenge the loyalty of Massachusetts or of Pennsylvania or of Kansas to the cause which Gen. Grant led to victory at Appomattox. But the Republican conventions in those States nevertheless passed the following resolutions:

In Massachusetts this one:

That sound reason, as well as the wise and unbroken usage of the Republic, illustrated by the example of Washington, requires that the tenure of the Chief Magistracy of the United States shall not exceed a second term.

The Republicans of Pennsylvania resolved as follows:

That we declare a firm and unqualified adherence to the unwritten law of the Republic which wisely and under the sanction of the most venerable of examples limits the presidential service of any citizen to two terms; and we, the Republicans of Pennsylvania, in recognition of this law, are unalterably opposed to the election to the Presidency of any person for a third term.

The Republicans of Kansas adopted this resolution:

That the unwritten law enacted by the example of the Father of his Country in declining a reelection to a third term is as controlling as though it was incorporated in the National Constitution and ought never to be violated.

A national convention of Republicans who were opposed to a third term, whether successive or otherwise, was called to meet in St. Louis in May, 1880.

Resolutions protesting against the election of any man to the third term were unanimously adopted, together with the following preamble:

In pursuance of the demand, and representing the convictions of what we believe to be a majority of the Republican Party throughout the Union, this convention of Republicans has assembled for the purpose of declaring those convictions with reference to the present aspect of political affairs. This action is necessary in view of the determined efforts to force upon the party the nomination of a candidate for the Presidency for a third term in defiance not only of the traditions of the Government but also of the solemn declarations of the Republican Party through its conventions in the largest and controlling Republican States, reaffirmed by its Representatives in the popular branch of Congress and adopted by the entire party in the declarations of its latest presidential candidate.

Despite the most vigorous effort of Mr. Conkling and his Stalwarts, and refusing to be swept from their moorings by the most impassioned and perhaps the most eloquent nominating speech ever delivered to a convention, the Republican national convention held fast to the old tradition and refused to nominate Gen. Grant for a third term.

These are the precedents which have come down to us from those who have carried the torch of liberty through a century of effort to negative and discredit the theory of the divine right of kings. It was because we sensed danger in the air and reckoned accurately that this old tradition was about to be challenged that we wrote these words into the Democratic platform in 1912:

We favor a single presidential term, and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible for reelection, and we pledge the candidate of this convention to this principle.

[Applause.]

I am aware, most painfully aware, that we have drifted from the old moorings to which our fathers clung with such devoted tenacity, but I do not believe we are ready yet to abandon this ark of the covenant. [Applause.]

I know we are told that the old order changeth; that this old turbulent earth has had a new birth of freedom; and that out of the travail and misery of it all a new evangel has come to bless mankind; but I also know that there was never liberty in this world until it was adjusted to the orderly processes of our institutions; that never until our fathers ordained and established the more perfect Union was the breath of life breathed into the proposition that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

The air indeed is full of voices, but as I hear them they do not sound the chorus of the Union that Lincoln told us of. To my ear, unattuned to these new measures, they are as "sweet bells jangled out of tune and harsh."

Mr. Speaker, our fathers had to fight for their liberty, and having won it they knew its value. We inherited ours, and it sometimes happens that a favored heir undervalues his legacy.

We have tampered, unwisely I think, with the fundamental law of the land, but I pray we may not in our somnambulism forget also even the traditions of the fathers, for we are told by a great historian—

No people who have not cherished with pride the deeds of their remote ancestors have ever achieved anything worthy to be remembered with pride by their remote descendants.

Above all, let us not abandon this, our oldest if not most sacred, tradition, sanctioned as it is by the accumulated wisdom of all our history, unless unhappily we are also ready to say with the elders of Israel: "Behold thou art old and thy sons walk not in thy ways; now make us a king to judge us like all the nations." [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the membership of this House must be congratulated in the opportunity that they have had to listen to the inspiring and patriotic address of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] on this question of a third presidential term. Every man who listened to this address will know that it will be quoted on the floor of this House, on the floor of the Senate, and throughout the United States generations after every present Member of this body has passed from the Chamber, and I know that we ought to be proud to be Members of a body that has a man with the courage, patriotism, and ability displayed by the gentleman from Mississippi. [Applause.] He called attention, Mr. Speaker, to a broken pledge; and perhaps the example given in high places of the breaking of this pledge might have inspired some of the lesser lights of the administration to a violation of a law to which I expect to call attention to-day.

It is my desire to call the attention of the House very briefly to a grave violation of the laws of the United States by the Postmaster General, and a violation aimed directly at ex-service men. The facts are clear; and in my opinion, without any expense, either the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service or the Post Office Committee of the House of Representatives should conduct an investigation, determine the facts, and if possible see that the law is complied with and justice done to men entitled to it. The post office referred to is in Nashville, Tenn., in the district of the Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, who I have been told by American Legion officers and personally know is in no way responsible for the situation or violation of law, is and has been a consistent friend of the ex-service man. The facts are as follows:

1. Applicants: The two applicants for this position were Mr. Robert C. Webster, ex-soldier, and Mr. Charles McCabe, former secretary of Senator SHIELDS.

2. Ratings: After the examination Mr. McCabe was rated 75 per cent and Mr. Webster was rated 71 per cent; but the Civil Service Commission, under the soldiers' preference rule, certified to the Post Office Department the name of Mr. Webster as the highest qualified eligible.

3. General statement: A general statement of the case is set out in a protest filed with the President, hereto attached.

4. Webster's age: Mr. Webster was born January 20, 1890, and filed his application for this office on December 27, 1919. He was, therefore, 24 days less than 30 years old at the time of filing his application. However, on January 26, 1920, six days after he became 30 years of age, he amended his application by swearing to same, and this new oath was made before the Civil Service Commission had rated his papers, before his name had been certified to the Post Office Department, and before the time limit for the filing of his application had expired. This time limit had been fixed by the Civil Service Commission as January 31, 1920.

5. Webster's qualifications: The Civil Service Commission ruled that Mr. Webster was qualified as to age, and Mr. Morrison, of the Civil Service Commission, supported by the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, takes the position that an age waiver is provided for ex-service men, and, furthermore, that, had no waiver been provided, Mr. Webster's amended application met all the requirements of the laws and regulations. The Civil Service Commission further takes the stand that the commission is the sole judge of all qualifications of applicant except the qualifications of character and residence.

6. Mr. Burleson's statement: Mr. Burleson frankly states in the correspondence herein quoted that Mr. Webster's name was certified to him as the highest qualified eligible, but that he disqualified Mr. Webster on account of not meeting age requirements.

And this in spite of the fact that his amended application was filed within the time limit and after Mr. Webster became 30 years of age.

I have a resolution, introduced before the national executive committee by Mr. Berry, State commander for the State of Tennessee, and, as I shall not have time to read it, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. As these statements are very vital, I am incorporating them herewith. The first of these statements is a telegram as follows:

HARRY S. BERRY,
State Commander, American Legion, Nashville, Tenn.:

Answering your telegram to Postmaster General, Mr. McCabe was the highest eligible, and for that reason his nomination was forwarded to the Senate. Records of department show that Mr. Webster filed his application and oath December 27, 1919, at which time he was not yet 30 years of age. Requirements for position of postmaster at office of this size state applicants must be at least 30 years at time of making application.

J. C. KOONS, First Assistant.

I quote the following extracts from Mr. Burleson's letter of March 8:

The application of Mr. Webster states that he was born on January 20, 1890, and that he was 29 years of age his last birthday, and the oath to the application was made on December 27, 1919, or prior to the time that he reached the age of 30, and in the opinion of the department he was ineligible. The fact that he reached the age of 30 before a report reached the Post Office Department would not affect the case, as the requirement as set forth plainly states that he must have reached the age of 30 on the date of making oath to the application. The amended application, in the form of a sworn statement, referred to, was not filed with the department, but had it been it could not have been given consideration, as we would have been compelled to consider his original application.

Mr. Webster could not have been the highest eligible, as he did not attain as high a rating as Mr. McCabe, and could only have been the highest eligible had he been given the benefit of the preference statute. As he did not meet the requirements set forth above, in the judgment of the department he was not eligible; and, as stated before, in order that he might be given further consideration, his name was submitted to the President.

I also quote the following extract from Mr. Burleson's letter of March 12:

Referring to that part of your letter which states that because of the department's decision in this case, and the requirement of the Executive order that the name of the highest eligible shall be submitted to the President for appointment, you are unable to understand why the department submitted the name of Mr. Webster, I have to say that the department did not submit Mr. Webster's name to the President for appointment, but submitted for approval by the President the name of the highest eligible, Mr. McCabe, and a full statement of the conditions relative to Mr. Webster and his application. This was done because of the fact that the Civil Service Commission had disregarded the age limitation in his case and submitted his name as eligible for appointment; also in order that the President might have all the facts before him in his decision in the case.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have only a minute, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman contend that the appointments of postmasters in the presidential class are on the same basis as the civil-service employees in the different departments?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I certainly do contend that the same rules should apply. It was clearly the intent of the Congress in the act of July 11, 1919, that the President of the United States, the present President, when he puts postmasters under the civil service, civil-service rules should apply; if not, the President is faking the civil service.

Mr. BLACK. Will not the gentleman insert in his remarks the Executive order of the President as to presidential postmasters? I would be glad if he would do that.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I shall be glad to insert it, because I want all the facts given to the House. Following is the order:

APPOINTMENT OF FIRST, SECOND, AND THIRD CLASS POSTMASTERS.

The President, on March 31, 1917, issued the following Exectutive order:

"Hereafter when a vacancy occurs in the position of postmaster of any office of the first, second, or third class as the result of death, resignation, removal or, on the recommendation of the First Assistant Postmaster General, approved by the Postmaster General, to the effect that the efficiency or needs of the services requires that a change shall be made, the Postmaster General shall certify the fact to the Civil Service Commission, which shall forthwith hold an open competitive examination to test the fitness of applicants to fill such vacancy, and when such examination has been held and the papers in connection therewith have been rated, the said commission shall certify the result thereof to the Postmaster General, who shall submit to the President the name of the highest qualified eligible for appointment to fill such vacancy, unless it is established that the character or residence of such applicant disqualifies him for appointment. No person who has passed his sixty-fifth birthday shall be given the examination herein provided for."

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to say to the gentleman that I do not know how it has been done in other districts, but the present Executive order has been rigidly enforced and literally in my district, to my great sorrow.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I am delighted to have the gentleman assure me that there has been some attempt to comply with the law at least in one district of the United States. That, I dare say, was probably owing to the fact that the gentleman from North Carolina always stands for the enforcement of law when he can find what the law is, and his influence is so great with the President and the Postmaster General that they complied with the law in that one instance.

Mr. KITCHIN. In that one respect I have had no influence with them, and my opinion on the matter is such that I would vote to repeal that order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that I agree with him in that and, in the interest of efficient service, hope it will be modified and repealed immediately after March 4, 1921.

If there is one thing that the American Legion stands for in the United States, it is the enforcement of law, and this clear violation was taken up by Harry S. Berry, the State commander of the American Legion, at Nashville, Tenn. There can be no politics in the matter, because the Postmaster General is a Democrat, Mr. Berry is a Democrat, the Member of Congress in that district [Mr. BYRNS] is a Democrat, and practically everyone who lives in Nashville are Democrats. The facts were thoroughly gone into at a meeting of the American Legion now being held in the city of Washington, attended by representatives of every Democratic State in the United States, and the following resolution, introduced by Mr. Berry, the State commander for the State of Tennessee, was passed by the meeting:

Whereas under the civil-service laws, regulations, and Executive orders, and also under the interpretation of said laws, regulations, and orders by the Attorney General of the United States, the sole power to determine qualifications (character and residence excepted) of postal employees is vested in the Civil Service Commission; and

Whereas it is made mandatory by presidential Executive order that the Postmaster General submit to the President the name of the highest eligible certified to him by the Civil Service Commission; and

Whereas the Civil Service Commission, under the soldiers' preference provisions of the Revised Statutes, certified the name of an ex-service man as the highest qualified eligible for the position of postmaster at Nashville, Tenn.; and

Whereas the Postmaster General, in violation of law, regulation, and Executive order, not only failed to submit to the President the name of the highest certified eligible, but, on the contrary, substituted therefor the name of another applicant not entitled to the benefit of the soldiers' preference law; and

Whereas two requests for a hearing in this case were made upon the Postmaster General by officials of the American Legion, the first of which was ignored and the second denied; and

Whereas immediately following a request for a hearing this nomination was rushed through the Senate within 24 hours after the presentation of the name of the nominee, which action is without precedent where a contest had developed on the nomination: Be it

Resolved, That the action of the Postmaster General is declared irregular and illegal, and that it constitutes an act and establishes a precedent most discriminatory against ex-service men and women; be it further

Resolved, That the President be most earnestly requested to rectify this injustice and discrimination by declaring vacant the office of postmaster at Nashville, Tenn., and by directing that the name of the highest eligible as determined by the Civil Service Commission be forthwith submitted for confirmation; and

Whereas there have developed numerous other cases of unjust discrimination against ex-service men and women by the Post Office Department, for example the Edward G. Strickler case at Chambersburg, Pa.: Be it

Resolved, That Congress is hereby petitioned to take such measures as may be necessary to secure for ex-service men and women the benefits now provided for them in law, regulation, and Executive order.

Carried:

LEMUEL BOLLES, National Adjutant.

Further than that Mr. Berry has written the President of the United States a letter strenuously objecting to this violation of law and discrimination against ex-service men by the Postmaster General, and that letter is as follows:

NASHVILLE, TENN., March 3, 1920.

To His Excellency Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
The President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to a telegram to the Postmaster General making inquiry as to why the civil-service preference for ex-service men, now provided in law, was not extended in the case of the postmastership at Nashville, I received the following reply:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., March 2, 1920.

"In response to telegram to Postmaster General, Mr. McCabe was the highest eligible, and for that reason his nomination was forwarded to the Senate. Records of department show that Mr. Webster filed his application and oath December 27, 1919, at which time he was not yet 30 years of age. Requirements for position of postmaster at office of this size state applicants must be at least 30 years old at time of making application.

"J. C. KOONS, First Assistant."

This statement is in essence untrue, and if it does not reveal a corrupt and dishonest motive it is an admission of a stupid mistake.

In the first place, Mr. McCabe was not the highest eligible as determined by the Civil Service Commission. Mr. Webster held the place at the top of the list of eligibles, and the Postmaster General, under the law and regulations, could only pass over him by reason of charges involving his character or his residence, and no charges of any nature were filed. In the second place, Mr. Webster was 30 years and 6 days old when he completed his application by reswearing to same on January 26, 1920. So the statement that the original application was signed on December 27, 1919, can only be conjured into a phantom technicality which vanished when the applicant reswore to the application. Furthermore, the regulations authorize the waiver of all age requirements in the case of ex-service men, and this again makes the Postmaster General's objection appear ridiculous. The civil-service act reads as follows:

"The Civil Service Commission shall certify the result (of examination of all applicants) to the Postmaster General, who shall submit to the President the name of the highest qualified eligible to fill such vacancy."

The Civil Service Commission in this case certified the name of Mr. Webster, and therefore the Postmaster General acted in violation of law when he submitted the name of Mr. McCabe.

Therefore the American Legion insists that the action of the Postmaster General was illegal and demands that the office of postmaster at Nashville be declared vacant.

Your administration has professed a friendly interest in the ex-service men and women and has passed laws which have been advertised as conferring certain definite benefits upon the ex-service men and women. And yet in the first case to arise, and under circumstances most suspicious, the first ex-service man who comes to receive the benefits that he has earned on merit, as determined under civil-service laws and regulations, is robbed of what the law provides for him and by what appears to be a low and sordid subterfuge.

The question involved is not the candidacy of an individual for a particular office, but the honest interpretation and administration of law. The question is not a matter purely local, but an issue that is nation wide.

Mr. President, the legion feels that this matter has never come to your attention, or if it has that you have been misled by misinterpretation in fact, and for this reason the legion wants the matter to be presented to you in its true perspective.

In this connection it is appropriate to remark that the unprecedented haste with which the confirmation of Mr. McCabe was railroaded through the Senate, within 24 hours after the name of the nominee was presented, was suggestive of a burglar making his get-away with his plunder.

The issue before you is to declare here and now whether the alleged benefits conferred upon service men by the laws enacted at your direction are a reality or a myth, and 5,000,000 ex-service men and women await your answer.

Respectfully,

HARRY S. BERRY,
State Commander.

I do not desire to introduce any resolution demanding information from the Postmaster General and that some committee conduct an investigation, because it is a useless waste of time. The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service has jurisdiction, and its chairman can take the matter up at once if he desires to do so; the Post Office Committee has jurisdiction, and can take the matter up if the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service does not.

There must come a time when direct violation of law by the Cabinet officers of this administration must stop, and one would think that common, ordinary judgment would dictate to the representatives of this administration that they can not discriminate against ex-service men in clear violation of the law and get away with it.

I ask that the matter be taken up by one of these committees, that the facts be determined, and that justice be done if it can be done.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEE VACANCY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the election of Mr. MOORE of Virginia to fill the vacancy on the Committee on Roads caused by the resignation of Judge Saunders from Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves the election of Mr. MOORE of Virginia to the vacancy caused by the resignation of Judge Saunders on the Committee on Roads. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order for to-day the House will consider unobjected bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that these bills may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on Claims, asks unanimous consent that the bills be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the calendar be called in regular order under this arrangement?

The SPEAKER. It will.

JOHN A. GAULEY.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2396) for the relief of John A. Gauley.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, owing to the absence of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], I ask that that bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the next bill.

PAY AND ALLOWANCES TO HEIRS OF COAST GUARD OFFICERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the House joint resolution 215, authorizing the legal heirs of certain officers of the United States Coast Guard who lost their lives when the Coast Guard cutter Tampa was destroyed in Bristol Channel September 26, 1918, to receive pay and allowances that would have accrued to said officers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman let the resolution be reported first?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 215) authorizing the legal heirs of certain officers of the United States Coast Guard who lost their lives when the Coast Guard cutter Tampa was destroyed in Bristol Channel September 26, 1918, to receive pay and allowances that would have accrued to said officers.

Whereas certain officers of the United States Coast Guard, serving on board the Coast Guard cutter Tampa in European waters, had been appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to temporary advanced grades in the Coast Guard, in accordance with law; and

Whereas the Coast Guard cutter Tampa, with all hands on board, was sunk at sea in the Bristol Channel, presumably by a German submarine, before commissions could be issued to the said officers; and

Whereas the accounting officers of the Government have ruled that under existing law the accrued pay and allowances under the said commissions may not be paid to the families of the deceased officers: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the appropriate accounting officers are authorized to pay to the legal heirs of the following-named officers of the Coast Guard the pay and allowances which would have accrued to said officers to and including September 26, 1918, had said officers received and accepted the temporary commissions on the respective dates that they became eligible for advancement, as follows: First Lieut. of Engineers John Thomas Carr to be a temporary captain of engineers from and including July 1, 1918; Second Lieut. John Farrell McGourty to be a captain from and including July 1, 1918; First Lieut. Roy Ackerman Bothwell to be a temporary captain from and including September 21, 1918; Second Lieut. James Marsden Earp to be a temporary first lieutenant from and including July 1, 1918, and to be a temporary captain from and including September 21, 1918.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what precedent we have for this legislation?

Mr. FOCHT. Innumerable precedents, I believe, could be cited. We are acting under the letter and the report we have from the Secretary of the Navy, giving the details and virtually recommending that the amount be paid.

Mr. BLANTON. Can the gentleman cite us a precedent?

Mr. FOCHT. I really can not. I do not think it is really necessary to have a precedent. We could make one by granting this allowance.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I will state that there was a case that Congress acted on recently where a general in the Army had been recommended for promotion in Texas, while on the border line in connection with the Mexican difficulties. He died, and Congress passed a resolution authorizing payment of pay and allowances at the advanced rank.

Mr. BLANTON. As I understand in this case, the commissions were ordered to be issued.

Mr. FOCHT. They were issued, and they are asking for the difference in time when the men went down on the Tampa——

Mr. BLANTON. They are asking for the difference between what they would have received and what they did receive before this accident?

Mr. FOCHT. That is all.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARD. I am in thorough accord with the resolution, but I want information in regard to the procedure. I note in the report of the Secretary of the Navy, as it appears on page 2 of the report of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that these officers who were lost on the Tampa:

Whose appointments to the higher grades were not issued until after the date of their demise or not issued at all.

Would there not be a very considerable difference between the issuing of the advanced rate, because that would put them on the list, and the fact that they were not issued at all? If they were not issued at all it would not correspond to the language in the resolution which provides that these men had been appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to temporary advanced grades in the next grade in accordance with the law. The report of the Secretary of the Navy is not clear on that, because he states they were "not issued until after the date of their demise or not issued at all."

Mr. FOCHT. But the recommendation had been made, and I do not see how there could be a conflict of dates, when the Secretary of the Navy would certainly know the status of these officers of the Navy. Consequently, it seems to me, if we are guided by his recommendation, we can not go far afield in making this allowance that means several hundred dollars.

Mr. GARD. I understand what his recommendation is. I believe in recognizing the advanced grade, however the grade has been made, but if the advanced grade had not been authorized at all, then a different state of affairs is presented.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. With the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. I will yield.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. The conditions at present with reference to these men is the following: Under the law they were entitled to the grade. If they had gotten to shore, to a place where they could have accepted it, they would have had the grade by their action and would have drawn the pay. But they were on the water in the performance of their duty, and while in the performance of their duty it prohibited and made impossible the acceptance by them of the grade which they otherwise would have had.

Mr. GARD. If the gentleman will pause a minute, the point I make is that they could not accept the appointment unless the appointment had been issued by the naval authorities.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. As the gentleman will note in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, he says, "Under the law they were entitled to the advanced grade." Under the law they were entitled to it. He says there were four who were due for advancement in accordance with the law. He says that in the second paragraph. It was an advancement that was theirs if they could take it. All they had to do was to get to the shore and accept.

Mr. GARD. Yes; and the appointment had to be issued by the Navy Department, and that was not done.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. They would have secured their allowance and advanced salaries simply by accepting.

Mr. GARD. I do not object to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution for amendment.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I notice that this resolution has been reported with the preamble retained. It is customary in acting upon resolutions of this character for either the committee to strike out the preamble or so to amend the resolution as to identify the particular action that is sought. I was wondering if the Committee on War Claims intended to strike out this preamble, or whether, if it was stricken out, it would still leave the language of the resolution in such shape as to convey the information as to the necessity for its passage.

Mr. FOCHT. It is ready for its passage.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, the preamble ought to be eliminated, and in line 5 of page 2 there should be inserted the words "who were lost at sea September 26, 1918."

Mr. FOCHT. On lines 11 and 12 that is indicated already.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but it does not indicate in the body of the resolution that the reason for passing this resolution is because of the loss at sea during the war of the cutter Tampa. That is stated in the preamble. It seems to me that ought to be included in the body of the resolution somewhere and the preamble eliminated.

Mr. FOCHT. Let the gentleman offer an amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I suggest that the preamble be stricken out, and that on page 2, line 5, after the words "Coast Guard," there be inserted the words "late of the Coast Guard cutter Tampa, which was destroyed in Bristol Channel September 26, 1918."

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, we accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 1, strike out all of the preamble, and on page 2, line 5, after the words "Coast Guard," insert "late of the Coast Guard cutter Tampa, which was destroyed in Bristol Channel, September 26, 1918."

Mr. FOCHT. The committee accepts the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division on the passage, for a record vote.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 2.

So the resolution was passed.

On motion of Mr. FOCHT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

ST. CROIX CHIPPEWA INDIANS OF WISCONSIN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2264) for the relief of the St. Croix Chippewa Indians of Wisconsin.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of the bill has been covered in the last Indian appropriation bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent that this bill be stricken from the calendar.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that, inasmuch as the subject matter of this bill has already been disposed of by the House, the bill be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves that the bill be laid on the table. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

MAJ. GEN. ENOCH H. CROWDER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2867) to authorize the President, when Maj. Gen. Crowder retires, to place him on the retired list of the Army as a lieutenant general.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HAWLEY. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next one.

HEIRS OF LEWIS J. BLAIR.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3791) to pay to the heirs of Lewis J. Blair, late lieutenant colonel of the Eighty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, the amount found due by the Court of Claims.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I make the reservation for the purpose of receiving further information regarding this claim, especially in the light of the communication of The Adjutant General in charge of the office, J. T. Kerr, of May 3, 1919, wherein it appears that the claim is now being made by Mr. F. P. Blair, of Laporte, Ind., who has certain information concerning the claim of his father, Lewis J. Blair.

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Speaker, this is the claim of Col. Lewis J. Blair, father of Mr. F. P. Blair, with whom the father lived during the last years of his life. I will state that this claim was pending before the death of the father and passed the House, I believe, at one time, and went over to the Senate and was tacked on to some Indian claims and was lost in that way. The matter was also referred to the Court of Claims, and it was found that this amount was due to Lewis J. Blair, and they recommended the payment of the same.

Mr. GARD. It appears from the letter of Adjt. Gen. Kerr to Representative HICKEY that Mr. Blair continued in his military authority as major, and that nothing has been found of record in the office of The Adjutant General to show that he was mustered into the service as lieutenant colonel, that he performed the duties of that grade, or that he was recognized by the military authorities as lieutenant colonel at any time prior to June 7, 1865. I do not think the facts are shown with sufficient clearness to entitle the man to the rank of lieutenant colonel.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. DEWALT. I gather from what has been stated that there was an adjudication of this by the Court of Claims.

Mr. HICKEY. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. And if there was an adjudication of it, why inquire any further? Unless that adjudication was appealed from by some competent authority, certainly the party is entitled to it.

Mr. HICKEY. And they found that he rendered this service.

Mr. GARD. The adjudication is that the Court of Claims found that he was refused to be mustered into the service as lieutenant colonel, because the command was below the minimum strength, and there was not anything to do.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GARD. Yes; surely.

Mr. DEWALT. Does the adjudication go so far as to say that this claim is a just claim and the amount is awarded?

Mr. GARD. No.

Mr. HICKEY. It shows that he performed the service, that there was no other officer there to perform the service, that a commission had been issued to him by the governor of the State of Indiana, that the law authorized the Government at that time to issue such a commission, and that there was due to this man the sum named in the bill.

Mr. DEWALT. That there was due to him the sum named in the bill?

Mr. HICKEY. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Well, that is an adjudication.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Court of Claims does not ever make a finding of that kind. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. HICKEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is this one of those cases where a commission was refused because the command under the officer was not of sufficient size to warrant the issuance of a commission? There are innumerable claims of that kind where commissions were recommended, but under the law could not be issued because the company or regiment, or whatever it was, did not have a sufficient number of men in it to warrant a commission of that rank. I think those cases have invariably been rejected by Congress in the past. I do not know whether this is one of them or not.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Is that so where there has been an adjudication of the Court of Claims in favor of the claimant?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Court of Claims does not adjudicate these claims at all.

Mr. DEWALT. That is what I was asking about.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. All that the Court of Claims does is to make findings of fact.

Mr. GARD. The Court of Claims only found that if the said Lewis J. Blair should be deemed lieutenant colonel of the Eighty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and entitled to the pay of that grade, the difference between his pay and allowances as a major, which he received, and that of a lieutenant colonel, to which he would have been entitled had he been mustered in, for the period from October 30, 1863, to June 14, 1865, would amount to $434.14. That is all they found.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This was a case determined by the Court of Claims upon reference by Congress. All the Court of Claims does in these cases is to find facts.

Mr. DEWALT. Well, but the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HICKEY] has stated affirmatively that the Court of Claims has said this party is entitled to a certain sum of money. That is an adjudication.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is the way the title of the bill reads. It is the natural assumption that a court renders a judgment of some kind.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is simply in the main a lack of familiarity with the proceedings of the Court of Claims in the cases referred to it by Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think this debate has gone far enough to develop the facts in this case. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. Does the gentleman from Ohio object?

Mr. GARD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

CERTAIN OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2448) for the relief of certain officers of the United States Army, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Section 8 of this bill contains the following:

SEC. 8. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to restore Harry Graham, captain of Infantry, to his former position on the lineal list of captains of Infantry immediately below that of Capt. John Randolph.

I am in favor of this proposed legislation. I voted for it once before, when it was before this House. The House passed a separate bill containing this provision. The Senate passed it, and it went to the President of the United States, who vetoed it; but it was sent back to the House, and is now either on the Speaker's table or has been referred back to some committee. What has become of it, I would like to know?

Mr. WALSH. It went to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLANTON. It went to the Committee on Military Affairs. The question I am raising is, Can we get around a veto by the President of the United States in this manner? The President having vetoed this legislation and sent it back to the House, I take it that it is the constitutional right of this House to vote on that veto. I am in favor of passing the legislation over the President's veto, and have always favored it, which requires a two-thirds vote; but I am not in favor of trying in this way to put something over the President. To pass this bill will require merely a majority vote. I take it that you can not fool the President with this kind of action; that if he vetoed this legislation once, he is going to veto it again, and send it back to us if we pass it as a rider in this bill. So what is the use of wasting our time in any such manner? Why do we not have the veto message brought before the House, and take a vote on it in the constitutional way?

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. FIELDS. It is my opinion that the report of the Judge Advocate General had not reached the Secretary of War or the President before the President vetoed that bill.

Mr. BLANTON. The President vetoed it on the recommendation of the Secretary of War.

Mr. FIELDS. The report of the Judge Advocate General, the head of the legal branch of the War Department, had not been called to the attention of the Secretary of War and the President. It is my opinion that if it had been called to the attention of the Secretary of War and of the President the bill would not have been vetoed. In view of that fact, and in view of the further fact that there are other provisions in this bill which are very meritorious, I trust that the gentleman from Texas will not object.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think I shall object to it, for I am in favor of the legislation.

Mr. FIELDS. My candid opinion is that if the report of the Judge Advocate General had been called to the attention of the Secretary of War the bill would not have been vetoed.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky, who is fair, and the chairman of the committee, who is fair, whether it is right to other parties whose rights, wholly distinct from this legislation, are embraced in this bill—is it fair to them to place this as a rider on their measure and to send back to the President a bill incorporating several different items with one that he has heretofore vetoed, when we who know the President know that when he makes up his mind it is made up?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In view of the fact that the President only vetoed the bill and gave no reasons in his veto message, notwithstanding the Constitution requires it, may it not have been that the President vetoed the bill because it did not contain provisions contained in this bill that he thought ought to go in?

Mr. BLANTON. No; if the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, who rarely ever misses anything contained in a document pertaining to legislation, will read the veto message again, he will find that the President did give a reason, stating that it was on the recommendation of the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The President in that document said that he returned the bill unapproved for reasons stated in a letter written by the Secretary of War. The Constitution requires the President in a veto message to give his reasons, and not by referring to John Smith or Harry Jones. However, it is vetoed.

Mr. BLANTON. I take it for granted that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois knew what was in the letter referred to by the President, because if he did not it is the first document that I ever heard of connected with congressional matters that the gentleman from Illinois was not familiar with. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Fortunately I was engaged in a better business at that time.

Mr. BLANTON. I would rather see the bill as we passed it before come back here and be presented to the House in a constitutional way than to send it back to the President in this manner, although I shall not object.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

CORRECTING ERROR IN INDIAN ALLOTMENT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9615) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to correct an error in an Indian allotment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of correcting an error made in the allotment on the public domain of Domatil E. Lafournaise, an Indian of the Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa, whereby the same is in conflict with the allotment of Jenoir Brien, a member of the same band, and to clear title to the land allotted to Jenoir Brien, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to issue a patent in fee to lot 5 of the southeast quarter of section 6, township 159 north, range 103 west of the fifth principal meridian in North Dakota, in favor of Henry E. Thomas, holder of a deed to the allotment of Domatil E. Lafournaise (now Patnaude); said patent to issue upon the execution by Henry E. Thomas of a quitclaim deed in favor of E. L. Hugelen, purchaser of the allotment of Jenoir Brien, covering lot 3 of the same section allotted to Jenoir Brien and erroneously included in the allotment of Domatil E. Lafournaise.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, Mr. SNYDER, at the request of the Interior Department, to correct an error. I think the report is clear on that point.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RHODES, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CAROLYN WHEELER KOBBE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1827) for the relief of Carolyn Wheeler Kobbe.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Carolyn Wheeler Kobbe, widow of Gustav Kobbe, who was killed as the result of an accident caused by a United States Navy seaplane, the sum of $10,000.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, line 8, strike out the figures "$10,000" and insert "$2,500."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 8, SHERIDAN COUNTY, MONT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2709) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to school district No. 8, Sheridan County, Mont., for block 1, in Wakea town site, Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont., and to set aside one block in each town site on said reservation for school purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue patent to school district No. 8, of Sheridan County, Mont., for block 1, in Wakea town site, in the former Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont., upon filing its application therefor, said block to be used and maintained for public-school purposes.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to set apart for public-school purposes not exceeding one block of unappropriated land in each town site in the former Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont., created under the act approved May 30, 1908 (35 Stats., p. 558), and to cause patents to be issued therefor to the school districts within such town sites, respectively, upon their filing application therefor, such lots or blocks to be used and maintained for public-school purposes: Provided, That Indian children residing in such school districts shall at all times be received in schools used and maintained for public-school purposes in the town sites covered by this act on equal terms with white children.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RHODES, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GEORGE B. HUGHES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2257) for the relief of George B. Hughes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to George B. Hughes, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000, as compensation for the loss of his right arm while in the performance of his duties as an electrician in the Government Printing Office during the month of January, 1899.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do it for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that here was an accident that occurred 21 years ago, by which a man lost his right arm in some mechanism in the Government Printing Office. It seems to me that there has been a most unusual delay, if this be a meritorious case, and probably it is.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I had some experience with the Committee on Claims a number of years ago, and I will say that the delay is not at all unusual. On the contrary, if a man can get his money for an injury in 15 or 20 years he is doing very well.

Mr. GARD. I am not criticizing the Committee on Claims, but it is indeed unfortunate that a man who has lost his right arm has been unable before this time to get his compensation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is there not on the statute books at the present time a law which takes care of injuries such as this?

Mr. GARD. A very excellent law—the compensation law.

Mr. WALSH. This accident occurred long before that law was passed?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] stated something about money owing to people as the result of an injury. This is not money owing to them; it is a pure gratuity, as I understand it; a gift from the Government.

Mr. GARD. There is no question but that from a legal standpoint it is a gratuity. I do not suppose there could be any legal liability shown, but nevertheless it is true that the Government should recognize a man as much as it recognizes a piece of machinery.

Mr. WALSH. We have done that and have passed a law, and now we are picking up a lot of cases that occurred 20 years before the law was passed—just gathering them up.

Mr. GARD. If the cases have merit, I am disposed to agree to them.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, at the time this accident occurred it was not the policy of the Government to pay anything at all for injuries incurred in the civil service of the Government. It was not until long after this accident happened that the Committee on Claims, during the time that Mr. CANNON was Speaker, for the first time, with one or two exceptions, brought in bills to pay a gratuity, or, as it is sometimes called, a recompense—though it could not be a recompense—to people who have been either injured in the Government service, while in the service, or to people who were injured by people who were in the Government service. After that we passed a general law on the subject, to be applied to future accidents, and Congress deliberately declined to make that act retroactive. The Committee on Claims, after the general act was passed, decided in a number of cases that they would report special bills to Congress covering accidents which had occurred recently prior to the passage of the general act, giving the same compensation that employees of the Government who were injured would have received if the general act had been applicable when the accident occurred, and likewise applying it also to people outside of the Government service who were injured by people inside of the Government service. Gradually, through the pressure brought to bear, the Committee on Claims more or less increased the time that it would go back and increased the amount that would be granted. I am not going to object to this bill. I have quit paying very much attention to private bills. Of course there is no more reason why the Government should pay a man who was injured 20 years ago than there is why it should pay a man who was injured 30 years ago, and no more reason for that than there is for paying a man who was injured 40 years ago. In fact, you could easily go back to the foundation of the Government, if there were people alive now who needed the money. Just where we will end I do not know. I have been under the impression that the Committee on Claims, under the leadership of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS], had been very careful about the bills that it reported on claims of this kind and on other claim subjects. That applies also to the other gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT], who is chairman of the Committee on War Claims.

It now costs several millions of dollars a year to pay for these accidents in the Government service, and very much more every year than it cost the year before. Why that is so I do not know. It costs very much more than the people who asked for the legislation said it could possibly cost at the time it was enacted. Of course public sentiment everywhere justifies paying a man who is injured in the Government service, because the public is always in favor of paying money out of the Treasury to some one, but never in favor of paying it in by themselves.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, every schoolboy knows, of course, that in the absence of some special statute a suit can not be brought against the Government. When I was speaking of the Government owing these people who have these claims, I was speaking of the moral obligation, and I take it that the Committee on Claims is not going to allow any of these claims unless it thinks a moral obligation exists. I know nothing about this particular claim, whether it ought to be paid or ought not to be paid, but I do know that when I was serving on the Committee on Claims, some eight years ago, there were claimants then who had been knocking at the doors of Congress for 10 years, using every power they knew to get just claims considered, and I know that some of those same claims—and I have in mind one, for example, where a man had his eye put out by careless shooting of the Marine Corps in practice—are still pending and still unpaid. The United States Government is the hardest creditor and the meanest debtor that I know of.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. When the gentleman was speaking I thought he possibly had in mind claims which had been referred to the Court of Claims, and adjudications made. I see now that he was referring to what he considers moral obligations, aside from purely legal considerations.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is what I had reference to entirely.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, reserving further the right to object, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. As I understand, during the war there was a period when none of these private claims was considered.

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not think there was a claim passed for the two years we were in the war.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That naturally resulted in some accumulation.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; and this claim is one that has been up several times. This man is still alive.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to George B. Hughes, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000, as compensation for the loss of his right arm while in the performance of his duties as an electrician in the Government Printing Office during the month of January, 1899.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 66, noes 0.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BLANCH UTLEY.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10317) for the relief of Blanche Utley.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think that this bill for the relief of Blanche Utley is entirely unreasonable in the amount of damages which was reported by the committee. Why, we only a few moments ago allowed $2,500 in the case of a death, and in the last but one bill $1,000 for the loss of a right arm, occurring 24 years ago, I think, and here is an allowance of $5,000 for mere superficial injuries, and under the surgeon's statement I am inclined to object to the passage of the bill, but I will reserve the right to object if the gentleman from Texas desires to make a statement.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, of course there is no monetary standard by which an injury of this kind to a young girl can be accurately and minutely determined. I should like to recite briefly the circumstances of this accident. This young girl, 7 years of age, a very beautiful child before this injury, as her pictures will show, was with her father and her mother on a public highway. A Government aeroplane in which the engine was defective and upon which the pilot had been working, was making a trial flight with the engine which this officer had repaired. He made all proper allowance for the extra distance necessary for rising from the ground, but, nevertheless, through some defect of the machine, it failed to clear a barbed-wire fence that skirted the public highway, and the underpart of the aeroplane caught up the top strand of the barbed wire and pulled it forcefully across the face, arms, and body of this little child. This was near one of the flying fields at Fort Worth, Tex. I would just like to read——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Where was the child at the time, on a public highway?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes, sir; on a public highway. I would just like to read from the report of the surgeon as to the nature of the injury:

Blanche Utley, age 7 years: Transverse wound across face, involving both sides of face; complete severance of nose to alar; incised wound from center of forehead to bridge of nose, 2 inches long, meeting wound running transversely across face, sutured. Skin wound on body, left side, region of last rib, superficial, 3 inches long, sutured. Multiple lacerations about right elbow.

Now, a subsequent report from the surgeon on December 29, 1919, shows that the injuries are even more severe than was supposed at the time of the injury, and that they are permanent. I saw this child at Fort Worth just after the adjournment of the special session last November. She has been transformed from a beautiful child into one who is maimed and disfigured for the remainder of her life. Now, as to what this means in terms of dollars and cents to a beautiful girl, I am unable to say, but I am inclined to think that the sum of $5,000 is not out of all proportion for an injury of that character to a beautiful girl of 7 years. The photographs of the child are here. I should like for any doubtful Member to look at them and see the injury pictorially. The photographs do not adequately represent the actual condition, but I should like for any doubtful man to see as well as he can pictorially the injury which has been done to this child. It seems to me that this is a case in which the Government ought to feel a sense of obligation, as much as it can so feel, and be responsible in the case of a private claim. While this arose clearly by accident, nevertheless it was during necessary governmental operation of the defective airplane. And here is a claim that must certainly appeal to the hearts and humanitarian instincts of every man who will consider the case. A beautiful child on a public highway, through no fault of hers, has been maimed and disfigured for life by the operation of a faulty Government machine. It is difficult to determine monetarily the standard by which such a case could definitely be measured, but I, for one, should not undertake to say that $5,000 is too great compensation or too great a gratuity for the Government to give to this girl who, through all the years of her life, must bear the scars of this injury which it has accidentally inflicted.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. GARD. I am very sympathetic with the unfortunate accident which occurred to this girl. I notice on page 14, as Exhibit A, the statement that only $25 was paid in full payment for medical services to this girl. It seems to me that injuries of the magnitude and extent described by the gentleman, which undoubtedly existed, should be given the very best of medical attention in the hope of restoring her features.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I am glad the gentleman called attention to that. Practically the only attention that could be given was simply to sew up the wounds. Investigations were made, for instance, with the Johns Hopkins University, to see if there could be——

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the gentleman with all due respect that I have read the report, and he is giving a very accurate description of what happened and of the seriousness of the injury, but that is not making any impression upon me, and the point I made is I shall object because we can not start in paying money out of the Federal Treasury at these times for these particular claims based upon any such standard of providing for a couple of scratches on the forehead and scars across the face of an 8-year-old girl.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman withhold his objection long enough for me to call attention to one thing further?

Mr. WALSH. I will reserve the right to object for the gentleman to make a further statement.

Mr. LANHAM. I wish to say to the gentleman that, while there is no standard perhaps by which it could be accurately measured, the sum was not arrived at in a haphazard way. A board of officers was appointed to make an investigation of this case, a personal examination of the girl's condition and all the circumstances of the case. That board of officers, after hearing the witnesses, and after seeing and examining the child, and after verifying every detail of the surgeon's report, recommended this payment of $5,000, and I may say that it was approved here in so far as it could be approved, but there was no authority for any such payment without an appropriation by the Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to the bill S. 2448, page 16 of the Private Calendar, with a committee amendment to strike out the first and eighth sections of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to return to the bill S. 2448; and what is the gentleman's request?

Mr. KEARNS. With a committee amendment to strike out sections 1 and 8 of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I object.

RELIEF OF OWNERS OF SCHOONER "WILLIAM H. SUMNER."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8647) for the relief of the owners of the American schooner William H. Sumner.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. I make a reservation, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Claims as to the policy pursued in claims of this sort. As written, this bill provides for a definite payment of money out of the Treasury to reimburse the owners of the American schooner William H. Sumner, whereas there are certain bills upon this same calendar which provide that, instead of making the appropriation directly, authority is given to proceed in the courts of admiralty for the purpose of determining the liability of the United States, and following it out along that line. Now, it seems to me to proceed in the latter way, and conferring the authority to sue for the purpose of determining liability, is better than making this outright payment.

Mr. EDMONDS. The policy of the committee is this: If it is acknowledged by the department that the accident is the fault of the department, and the amount of damages has been properly adjudicated by the department, we pass a bill appropriating that money. If there is a question as to the liability of the Government in the collision, we hold the case up and send it to the Court of Claims for adjudication.

Mr. GARD. There are other cases where the same situation prevails?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. But there are no cases that there is any doubt about. Here is a case where the department itself acknowledges they were to blame for the collision.

Mr. GARD. I read from the report of the Secretary of the Navy that the responsibility rested on the U. S. S. North Dakota for not moving out of the way, because it was being propelled by steam, whereas this other boat was a sailboat and could not get out of the way.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is ordinary maritime law.

Mr. GARD. I understand that. But it seems to be that, instead of making this direct appropriation, even when the Secretary of the Navy gives his——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I will be glad to yield.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Would there be any good policy in requiring the owner of a vessel to sue in the Court of Claims if he is willing to take the amount which the Secretary of the Navy or the head of the Government department admits that he would recover?

Mr. GARD. I do not know whether the Secretary of the Navy could make any agreement as to what a man would recover from this Congress or anybody else.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. He could not make an agreement, but it is up to him to furnish the testimony in behalf of the Government, and if he admits the amount in controversy, where is there any benefit in requiring the Government to defend a suit and the claimant prosecute a suit?

Mr. GARD. The benefit is this, as I view it, that when a case of this kind is presented authority should be given to bring a suit in a court. Then, if the Government through its proper executive officer recognizes the liability it can file their answer, admitting it is liable in a certain amount, whereby the court, with the consent of the parties——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman can readily see that it is practically impossible for the Government to secure a decree or judgment in a less amount than is admitted by the department, and might be struck for a much larger amount which would be claimed by the claimant.

Mr. GARD. The matter is open for investigation. It confers, as I look at it, and I have tried to look at it recently, an authority in the executive officer to determine what the amount of damage in a particular case would be. He might say it was $5,000, and there might be deserved criticism for his saying it was $5,000 when in reality it was only $2,500. There might be criticism of the Secretary of the Navy for gross extravagance on the floor of this House, and such criticism could be obviated, as I look at it, by the adoption of a definite policy of sending these cases to a court for judicial determination which would be binding on the Secretary of the Navy and a recommendation to this House.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman knows that up to a limited amount it is the constant practice of the Congress now under a law which we passed to allow the Secretary of the Navy to settle all these claims when of limited amount, and various other departments of the Government do the same thing.

Mr. GARD. My recollection is, when it only amounts to $500.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. A small amount; but still they settle these matters, and they state the reasons for the amounts that are awarded by them. I can see where the Government could lose, but I can not see where the department could gain by going into a lawsuit for an amount, when the man in charge of it says we owe it.

Mr. GARD. I could see where the Government could lose where somebody in charge of it would return a hasty liability on the part of the Government, returning a sum that the Government should not stand for in any legal sense.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to this difference, where it is merely a certification by the Secretary of the Navy that is dependent mostly upon the contention of the claimant. The claimant presents certain matters connected with his claim before the Secretary of the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy does not hunt up evidence as to whether or not those allegations are true and proper——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. BLANTON. I mean to the extent that the Government would be protected the same as if the matter was before a tribunal for adjudication, where the witnesses could be cross-examined.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It would be in those cases just as it would be in this case, where an accident occurs, where the officers in charge of the ship involved make an investigation, and usually a commission or something of that sort may be appointed in addition, and they find the amounts in specific items. I do not think that they ever give them what is awarded, unless it be in a matter of demurrage, in which case the Congress ought to allow it. But they find the amount and know how it is made up in all of these cases.

Mr. BLANTON. The point I make is that the good which is usually derived from cross-examination of the claimant's witnesses in a court of justice is not available in so far as these reports of the Secretary of the Navy are concerned.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Government could not cross-examine its own witnesses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GREEN of Iowa). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William C. Reid, managing owner, and other owners of the American schooner William H. Sumner, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,354.57, to reimburse said owners of the American schooner William H. Sumner for damages suffered by their vessel as a result of a collision with the U. S. S. North Dakota off of Cape Henry, Va., on November 21, 1914.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 0.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next one.

ESTATE OF JOHN M. LEA.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2440) for the relief of the estate of John M. Lea, deceased.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, in full settlement of the following claim, to the Nashville Trust Co., administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo of the estate of John M. Lea, deceased, late of Nashville, Tenn., the sum of $6,883.31, that being the amount found due by the Court of Claims for rents collected by the Quartermaster Department, United States Army, during the Civil War from the tenants of said John M. Lea, which rents were paid into the Treasury of the United States, as reported to Congress in Senate Document No. 48, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman having the measure in charge if the amount found due, some $6,800, is held in the Treasury? The report states that "the money is in the Treasury." It is held for this particular purpose?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And has been for all these years?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course, the money is not in the Treasury, except as it has been raised by taxes since.

Mr. REED of New York. This money was collected as rents at that time and covered into the Treasury.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Very well. It has been paid out many years ago.

Mr. FOCHT. But not to these heirs of John M. Lea.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I know that reports frequently say that the money is in the Treasury, and the statement is frequently made in the House that certain money is in the Treasury, but the money does not stay in the Treasury that long, and money is not impounded in the Treasury.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. FOCHT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next one.

JOHN K. ASHLEY, JR.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1790) for the relief of John K. Ashley, jr.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money heretofore appropriated for the purchase of a site and construction of a building to be used by the Government as a post office, and for other purposes, at Sandpoint, Idaho, the amount of $40 in full compensation of claim of John K. Ashley, jr., for services rendered and money expended in connection with the preliminary survey and examination of a site that is being considered as the site of such building, the amount of $40 being paid by the said John K. Ashley, jr., to men in his employ for a period of time when, through no fault of his, work for which the men were retained could not proceed because a representative of the Government was not at hand to observe the surveys, tests, and experiments being made by Mr. Ashley.

With a committee amendment as follows:

Page 1, line 11, strike out the words "the amount of $40 being," and on page 2, lines 1 and 6, inclusive, the words "paid by the said John K. Ashley, jr., to men in his employ for a period of time when through no fault of his work for which the men were retained could not proceed because a representative of the Government was not at hand to observe the surveys, tests, and experiments being made by Mr. Ashley.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask the gentleman who introduced this bill what the preliminary survey and examination of a site, or the site that is being considered as the site of such building, has to do with imposing a liability on the Government for such survey when it is made by some other than a Government officer?

Mr. FRENCH. I would say that the Treasury Department entered into a contract with Mr. Ashley to make a preliminary survey.

Mr. WALSH. Then this is the result of some contractual agreement?

Mr. FRENCH. To this extent: A claim for $40 is the result of the inspector failing to be present for four days after being notified by Mr. Ashley, and actual expenses incurred by Ashley on account of this delay. That part of it was an oral understanding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FRENCH, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HERMAN W. SCHALLERT.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6414) for the relief of Herman W. Schallert.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have some information in addition to the short statement of Mr. Schallert, contained in the very limited report. There is no report save the letter of the Postmaster General and the statement of Mr. Schallert.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Ohio will permit, as I understand this case it is one that addresses itself to a great extent to the equitable powers of the Congress more than in a general way. This man was a postmaster at a little place of 200 inhabitants. His yearly compensation by commissions amounted to about $400. I think I am correct in that.

Mr. VOIGT. That is right.

Mr. BEE. It amounted to $400 a year. There was a robbery of his post office one night, and the safe was blown open, and $642 worth of material was stolen out, which he was compelled to pay.

The department was unable to make payment because of the fact that the postmaster under the regulations was required to lock the outer door and the inner door of the safe as well. He locked the outer door, but did not lock the inner door to the smaller compartment of the safe.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman is mistaken. He locked the inner door, but did not lock the outer door.

Mr. BEE. It may be that the reverse of my statement is correct as to that.

Mr. GARD. He left the door unlocked.

Mr. BEE. But anyway it was immaterial whether he locked it or not, for the reason that the safe was blown open by an explosion. The committee considered that question very seriously. If it had been a question of the forcing of the safe by any mechanical device the situation would have been different, and the postmaster certainly would not have been entitled to recover for his own negligence, but where it was burglary by an explosive that scattered the goods in the store all over the place it is immaterial, and whether it was the outer or the inner door that was locked makes no difference. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit the statement, what appealed to the committee particularly was the fact that here was a man living in a small place of 200 inhabitants, getting only $400 a year, while serving as postmaster for the accommodation of the people of that community, and without fault on his part by burglary of the store not only has he lost his $400 compensation that he would have received but he is required to pay $242 in addition. In other words, it is costing him $642 to serve the people of this small community as postmaster and get nothing whatever for it. It seems to me to be a case that appeals very strongly to the good conscience of the Members of the House, and that they ought to be willing to grant this relief.

Mr. GARD. Notwithstanding the man's small compensation as postmaster, he was given this amount of Government material to keep not for his own use but for the benefit of the postal patrons.

Mr. BEE. I understand that.

Mr. GARD. And he was supposed to protect it in a safe, which he did not do.

Mr. BEE. Yes; he did. If the gentleman will permit me, I tried to make that clear at the beginning. If this had been a burglary by the appliance of some mechanical device to the safe his negligence would have precluded him from being relieved from the loss of Government property; but any action that he might have taken could not have changed the result in view of the explosion by which the safe was blown open. For that reason the committee thought the case was taken out of the postal regulations, which prohibit repayment.

Mr. GARD. The letter of the Postmaster General states that the case is not taken out of the postal regulations, and there is no evidence submitted which would warrant the relief.

Mr. BEE. Let me say to the gentleman from Ohio that as I understand it, if this man had in all things complied with the postal regulations he would have been entitled to his money without coming to Congress, and this bill would not have been necessary. It is only necessary because he does not come within the category of the relief granted by the Post Office Department, which has funds on hand for that purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $657.81 to Herman W. Schallert to reimburse him for stamps stolen from the post office at Chaseburg, Wis., on April 23, 1915, while said Schallert was the postmaster of said place.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out, in line 5, "$657.81" and insert "$642.90."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THOMAS BAYTON AND BERTHA M. HARTT.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3984) for the relief of Thomas Bayton and Bertha M. Hartt.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a claim for the payment of $300 for the loss of a bull which was killed by becoming entangled with a telephone wire, the property of the United States, on the Olympic National Forest in the State of Washington. Was this forest let out to pasturage?

Mr. HADLEY. The claimants owned the land adjacent to the forest reserve, and the telephone wire in which the animal became entangled was strung from the forest across the corner of the pasture of these claimants over their private lands. In some way the wire became loosened and fell from its anchorage, and the bull became entangled in it.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but the bill says that the bull was killed by becoming entangled with a telephone wire, the property of the United States, on the Olympic National Forest. What was the bull doing in the forest?

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Speaker, the Olympic National Forest had a telephone wire on it which was maintained by the United States Government. The employees in charge had been maintaining it there, but during that season it had not been in current use, although it was still strung. It passed across the private land of these claimants. The bull is not represented as being on the Government reserve. He was in the private pasture of the claimants. The wire was strung across the corner of their field, and in some way the bull became entangled in the wire. He was near the edge of a bank, and when the wire was cut loose, the bull, in his struggles having been thrown and his head pointing down a steep bank, he struck his head against a log in the ravine and was killed.

Mr. WATSON. What evidence came before the committee that the animal was worth $300?

Mr. WALSH. He had a registered pedigree.

Mr. HADLEY. The claimants say that the bull was worth a good deal more than that. He was an imported, registered Guernsey bull, 2 years old at the time he was killed. They paid $140 for him when he was 6 months old, bringing him from Canada. He was their herd sire, designed for that purpose, and had already been employed in that service. They submitted the question to the forest reserve people on the basis of $500. The representative of the Forestry Department made inquiry, through sundry correspondence in the States of Oregon and Washington, among breeders and cattle raisers and people well informed on the subject, and certainly the preponderance of evidence will show the value of the bull to have been as much as $300, if not in excess of that amount. The Government acquiesced in the amount of $300, and no question has been raised as to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I note in the report that this bull, whose name was Joyfuls Glenn, was found by a man named Dougherty entangled in the wire, and when he arrived at the scene the bull was kicking a great deal and apparently unhurt and very much alive; that he cut the wire, and the bull pitched down the embankment, his whole weight pressing his head against a log lying in the creek, which shut off his wind. That seems to have been the fate of Joyfuls Glenn. [Laughter.]

Mr. HADLEY. The bill says that he was killed by becoming entangled in the telephone wire. This man Dougherty, to whom the gentleman refers, came upon the scene by the request of a young boy, who, when he was hunting the cows, found the bull. The bull was not then dead. Mr. Dougherty was not the representative of the Government, neither was he the representative of the claimants. He cut the wire, and the animal, which was struggling to get relief, pitched headlong down the embankment.

The Government, after investigation, made no claim of negligence on the part of the claimants, and if there was any question of negligence on the part of Dougherty it was not raised, and the Government took the position that even if Dougherty's act was negligence it was not such an intervening cause as to break the causal connection between the negligence on the part of the Government's representatives and the death of the bull.

Mr. GARD. The report further says that the bull could have been saved by proper precautions before the wire was cut.

Another remarkable bit of testimony showing the versatility of the animal is that a woman identifies the bull as being suspended by the hind legs from a telephone pole. I am wondering how the bull did come to his untimely end. [Laughter.]

Mr. HADLEY. I have stated the substance of the record, whatever that testimony may have been. I am familiar with the main facts of the record.

Mr. GARD. I am willing to accept the testimony of the supervisor. It seems to me rather queer that one person says he was suspended from a telephone pole and another one says that he came to his death by falling down an embankment and jamming his head against a log.

Mr. HADLEY. There is no doubt but that he is dead and that he was worth more than $300.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Thomas Bayton and Bertha H. Hartt, of Elwha, Clallam County, Wash., the sum of $300, as compensation for the loss of a bull owned by them, which was killed September 15, 1915, by becoming entangled with a telephone wire, the property of the United States, on the Olympic National Forest in the State of Washington.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out the initial "H.," in line 6, and inserting the initial letter "M."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the initial "H." after the word "Bertha," and insert the initial "M."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HADLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ACTIONS FOR DEATH ON THE HIGH SEAS.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate concurrent resolution 25 and to consider the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 25.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (S. 2085) relating to the maintenance of actions for death on the high seas and other navigable waters, the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out, on page 2, line 15, of the engrossed bill, the word "fault" and insert "default" in lieu thereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate concurrent resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

GEORGE E. PAYNE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3212) for the relief of legal representative of George E. Payne, deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman who proposes the legislation what action was taken in the Fifty-ninth Congress?

Mr. DUPRÉ. If the gentleman will look at page 11 of the report, he will find a statement there made that from the 10th of December, 1862, the second day after the seizure of his property, the claimant has been earnest and energetic in pressing his claim. Further on page 11 he will see that the matter went to the Court of Claims in 1887. It was subsequently referred again to the Court of Claims, and consideration of the case then was dismissed because it was held that only one House of Congress did not have the right to make such a reference.

I will add that I have been here 10 years and I have been pressing this claim ever since I have been here. On two previous occasions the bill has been favorably reported to the House, but no opportunity was had for its consideration. This is the first time since I have been here that an opportunity has been given to thrash this matter out on the floor.

If the gentleman will review the very voluminous report upon the subject, he will see that there has been no laches in pressing this claim, that there has been a persistent attempt to have it adjudicated in the various tribunals provided by law and before the Congress.

Mr. WALSH. The liability is alleged to have attached in 1862?

Mr. DUPRÉ. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. About how much will this cost the Government if the adjudication is made?

Mr. DUPRÉ. I was just now asked that question by the chairman of the Committee on War Claims [Mr. FOCHT], because he assumed, as I did, that that would be a timely and a pertinent inquiry. I have been trying to find out by reviewing the report exactly how much the maximum award of the Court of Claims could be, and while I do not want to make the assertion finally and definitely, yet I think the maximum amount involved is about $6,688. That statement, however, is very hastily made, not intended to be authentic or binding. For instance, on page 11—has the gentleman found the part to which I refer?

Mr. WALSH. I have found the part that refers to those figures, but of course that does not mean that that is the liability or the extent of it.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Of course, as the gentleman realizes, this is not a matter of payment out of the Treasury; it is a matter of adjudication by the Court of Claims.

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman satisfied that if this bill should become a law, this claim of the legal representatives of Mr. Payne can be properly passed upon by the Court of Claims, so that Congress can act intelligently in the future?

Mr. DUPRÉ. I have that hope.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, it has been there twice before.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. It went out once on a question of jurisdiction, and another time because only one branch of the Congress referred it. Is the gentleman satisfied this follows the usual reference of claims of this sort?

Mr. DUPRÉ. I understand that the present bill has been drafted in the light of these previous decisions of the court and in conformity with the precedents that apply to cases similarly situated.

Mr. WALSH. Recent precedents?

Mr. DUPRÉ. I have had some correspondence with the gentleman who has been most deeply interested in this matter, a gentleman from my State, who informs me that he thinks the bill is in proper shape, and that, if sent to the Court of Claims, at last we might have an adjudication on its merits.

Mr. WALSH. Who is the legal representative of George E. Payne?

Mr. DUPRÉ. I am not prepared to state whether he is an executor or an administrator, but the Payne family are people who are very well known in my home city of New Orleans. George E. Payne, who owned this property, was a citizen of New York, who came down to Louisiana about 1850. He purchased this property and his descendants have been living in Louisiana ever since. The gentleman has observed that the reservation of Mr. Payne's loyalty has been again inserted into the bill, but that while the Court of Claims heretofore dismissed the claim on account of want of jurisdiction, yet it found that Mr. Payne had been loyal during the war. This property was within the zone that was exempted from the operations of President Lincoln's proclamation.

Mr. WALSH. In view of the information given by the gentleman from Louisiana, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object for the purpose of asking a question. I have a claim coming to me from a constituent, based on a claim of this same character. I recently addressed an inquiry to the clerk of the Court of Claims, and if I am not mistaken I was told in the reply that Congress recently passed a law refusing further reference of Civil War claims to the Court of Claims.

Mr. DUPRÉ. That is what is known as the Crawford amendment. I think this bill has been so drawn as to overcome the Crawford amendment and the reference to the Court of Claims by only one branch of Congress. This bill contemplates action by both the Senate and the House, and therefore it would have the effect in its passage and in its reference to the Court of Claims of doing away with what is generally known as the Crawford amendment or any other law of Congress.

Mr. RHODES. Does the gentleman mean to say that by the employment of methods pursued in this legislation Civil War claims are not referred to the Court of Claims?

Mr. DUPRÉ. I take the position that both Houses of Congress, with approval by the Executive, have the right to pass an act referring a particular bill to the Court of Claims, and that if any contrary antecedent legislation has been had on the subject, quoad a—this particular claim—previous law is repealed by this bill if it becomes law. I am not an authority on war claims, I will say to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the legal representative of George E. Payne, deceased, of New Orleans, La., for personal property taken by United States officers, and for the crop of sugar sold by the sequestration commissioners, and the net proceeds transferred by them to the Quartermaster's Department and used for public good, and for the use and occupancy of the plantation of said deceased, taken by United States Army officers and turned over to the United States Treasury agent, and by said agent leased to William Spear for the year 1864, and for the use and occupancy by the Freedmen's Bureau for the year 1865, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims of the United States for adjudication, at the fair and reasonable rental and the value of the property taken and used as aforesaid, on the evidence heretofore presented and such other evidence as may be adduced, any statute of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, however, That it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that said George E. Payne did not give any aid or comfort to the late Civil War, but was throughout the war loyal to the Government of the United States.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, on page 2, line 3, after the word "the" by inserting the word "competent," and on line 4, same page, by striking out the words "such other evidence as," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "that."

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, in that connection, if the gentleman will permit, I will say that I understand those are the amendments recommended by the committee in its report at the end of the bill.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. At the end of the bill.

Mr. DUPRÉ. In the copy of the bill which I have, as reported from the committee, there are no amendments reported. May I ask the Speaker whether the Clerk is reading from a copy that has the committee amendments reported?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He is not.

Mr. DUPRÉ. That is evidently an oversight. I am very glad to have the amendment offered by the gentleman accepted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. EVANS of Nebraska: Page 2, line 3, after the word "the" where it occurs the second time in the line, before the word "evidence," insert the word "competent," and, on page 2, line 4, strike out the words "such other evidence as" and insert in lieu thereof the word "that."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman offer this as a committee amendment?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I do.

Mr. DUPRÉ. And may I say, further, that I called the attention of the chairman of the Committee on War Claims to the fact that this amendment was recommended by the committee in its report.

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; just a moment ago, and the committee accepts the amendment, of course.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FOCHT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EDWARD A. PURDY.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9583) for the relief of Edward A. Purdy, postmaster of the city of Minneapolis, Minn., for postage stamps, postal-savings stamps, war-savings stamps, war-tax revenue stamps, and cash from money orders stolen from the branch post office at Minneapolis, Minn., commonly known and described as the traffic station, and located at Nos. 621 and 623 First Avenue north, in said city.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask how the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads came to have jurisdiction of this bill?

Mr. STEENERSON. This is a claim for burglary, and we have uniformly reported such to the House. We have passed a good many of them.

Mr. WALSH. We have passed one here to-day that came from the Committee on Claims, where this bill properly belongs under the rules of the House.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will say to the gentleman I understand those claims that are referred to the Committee on Claims are those where there is a question whether the postmaster was guilty of negligence. There is no question of that kind in this case, and under the statute where a claim is less than $10,000 the Postmaster General is authorized to and always does pay the claim, but where it exceeds $10,000 he is required to investigate the fact and report to the Congress with his recommendation. You will find his recommendation here on the first page of the report.

Mr. WALSH. We passed claim No. 104 appropriating $642.90 to reimburse the postmaster for stamps stolen. He was not guilty of negligence.

Mr. STEENERSON. No. But let me call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Postmaster General in that case had full authority to pay, but disapproved the claim. Unless it had been disapproved it could never come before the Committee on Claims, because it would have been paid by the department.

Mr. WALSH. But it was necessary to file a bill, which was filed and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, no; the Postmaster General could have paid that bill without any reference to the Congress, but because he did not do it they had a bill presented to the Court of Claims.

Mr. WALSH. It did not go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. STEENERSON. I meant to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WALSH. That is where this bill belongs. What is in the rule that takes this away from the Committee on Claims?

Mr. STEENERSON. We have done that several times and it is generally considered that both committees would have jurisdiction. We have reported in the last two or three years half a dozen of these bills that have been sent to Congress with a formal letter of approval of the Postmaster General, which was done in this case.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the gentleman's contention that the Post Office Committee is willing to let the Committee on Claims deal with $40 or $50 claims or $500 or $600 claims, but when it gets up to $13,000 that the Committee on Claims can not be relied on to pass intelligently upon it and it must go to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads?

Mr. STEENERSON. No. It was referred to the Post Office Committee, and that has been the custom, because it is a case where there is no question of negligence, nobody claims that there was any, but it was a clear case of burglary, and the Postmaster General found that it was such a case, and he would pay it except under the statute it says where it is in excess of $10,000 he would have to transmit it to Congress in a formal way for payment.

Mr. WALSH. Well, that has not anything to do with the jurisdiction of the committee, whether it is $10,000 or whether it is $100. The rules provide that we have a committee here to consider and report upon claims. Now, we have passed a bill appropriating some $600 for a similar case, theft of postage stamps, and here is one calling for $13,000, coming from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and I have not heard the discussions with reference to the jurisdiction to which the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads refers.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will say the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE] had a bill for some ten or twelve thousand dollars about a year ago, when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] was chairman of the committee, and the discussion was quite involved, and both committees claimed to have jurisdiction of that kind of claim, and it was recognized and the bill was passed. Now, in this case it was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in the House and we have given it consideration, heard testimony, and reported it. It seems to me that the proper time to have raised the point would have been at the time it was referred.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, do I understand the gentleman from Minnesota to say that the line of demarcation between the jurisdiction of these two committees is determined by whether it is clearly a case of burglary without negligence on the part of the postmaster or whether there is doubt as to negligence on the part of the postmaster? Is that the line of demarcation?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not think that is the line of demarcation as specified in the rule.

Mr. TILSON. In the Schallert case the report shows that the outer door of the safe had been left unlocked, and that the Postmaster General would not allow this credit because of the fact that the outer door of the safe was left unlocked. Now, in this case it appears that both doors of the safe were locked, according to the regulations. Does the gentleman now claim that on this account the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has jurisdiction? Is that correct?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; I do not make that contention. I say that has been the practice in these cases that have been referred to us. It is simply a matter of form of transmitting them to the Congress. We have acted upon them and make the appropriation. Of course there is no appropriation really involved here, because it simply credits the account of the postmaster with this amount.

Mr. TILSON. I am interested in the matter of committee jurisdiction and wondered how the line was drawn between the jurisdiction of these two committees.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would say we have had cases before the Post Office Committee where they were of a nature described by the gentleman, and because we did not care to go into doubtful questions as to negligence they were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. HICKS. How does this bill come before the Post Office Committee? Who assigned it to that committee—the Speaker?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HICKS. Then he has jurisdiction of it and not the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEENERSON. Who?

Mr. HICKS. The Speaker; he is the one who assigned it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly. There is a regular House document, consisting of the letter of the Postmaster General—House Document No. 175, Sixty-sixth Congress—and that was referred to the Post Office Committee.

Mr. HICKS. I presume the gentleman from Minnesota will admit that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads is more liberal than the Claims Committee, will he not?

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, no. I will not do that. I do not think we have passed favorably on a claim where there really was any dispute about it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, if the Committee on Claims have no objection to having the real claims passed upon by the Post Office Committee and they take care of the "chicken feed," I shall not object, but I can not agree with the contention of the gentleman from Minnesota that because there may be some little difference in the authority and jurisdiction of the Postmaster General, based upon whether there is negligence or fault on the part of the postmaster where the loss occurs, as to whether he can settle it or it must be done through an act of Congress, that that necessarily distinguishes between the jurisdiction of these two committees. We have a Committee on Claims against the United States, and this is a claim. It seems to me that under the rules this belongs to the Claims Committee.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. For a question.

Mr. GARD. What authority is there for this particular bill being on the Claims Calendar when it does not come from the Claims Committee?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, well, I think other committees report private bills that are within their jurisdiction and that do not come from the Claims Committee under the rules. I was just about to say when interrupted that if the Claims Committee are content with this matter, I shall not press my objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, now that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has delivered his lecture to the Claims Committee on having their rights invaded and jurisdiction assumed by some other committee, I would like to call attention to the fact that several months ago I raised this same question of jurisdiction on this kind of claim, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] then gave me the same answer that he now gives to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], that if the claim had been under $10,000 it would naturally have gone to the little Claims Committee, but being over $10,000——

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a minute. I want to finish my statement. But being over $10,000, his Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads assumed jurisdiction of it. And then I called the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota to the fact that the Claims Committee has had before it claims involving $100,000,000. So his contention inferentially that the Claims Committee is too small to consider a claim of $13,861.24 is without merit.

Now, there are some questions which I want to ask seriously of the gentleman from Minnesota in regard to the merits of this bill. There are two classes of this kind of claims; one is where the department regulations have been met in every particular. For instance, the department has a regulation that before a postmaster may be reimbursed for stamps and money and other postal articles alleged to have been stolen, if he is furnished with a combination-lock safe it must be shown at the time of the alleged robbery or burglary that that safe, inclosing the alleged stolen goods, was at the time locked with its combination lock in its most secure condition, and that unless that appears the Postmaster General will not approve a claim of this kind.

The gentleman stated it correctly that where the claim is under $10,000, and the postmaster met the requirement of the Postmaster General, which is a reasonable one, then the Postmaster General settles the claim himself without having the matter put before Congress. But where the postmaster does not meet the regulation, or where the claim is over $10,000, the matter must be presented before Congress by a bill. As to the second class of claims, where they do not meet the requirements of the orders of the Postmaster General, is this one of that kind of claims?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. At the time of this robbery I was first assistant county attorney of the county of Hennepin, where the robbery occurred.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not accusing the gentleman of being connected with the robbery. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It would not make any difference if the gentleman had.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure the gentleman who has just demanded the regular order does not want to force me to object to this bill. I am trying to ask a few questions to get some information. I am not going to object, if the information is satisfactory.

Mr. STEENERSON. I am willing to answer.

Mr. BLANTON. But if the gentleman forces me to do so, by demanding the regular order, I will object.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would like to answer if I can.

Mr. BLANTON. This is what I want to know, whether the regulations of the Postmaster General and his department have been met by proof in this case?

Mr. STEENERSON. They have, absolutely.

Mr. BLANTON. And the Postmaster General recommends this claim?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9583) for the relief of Edward A. Purdy, postmaster of the city of Minneapolis, Minn., for postage stamps, postal-savings stamps, war-savings stamps, war-tax revenue stamps, and cash from money orders stolen from the branch post office at Minneapolis, Minn., commonly known and described as the traffic station and located at Nos. 621 and 623 First Avenue north, in said city.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit Edward A. Purdy, as postmaster of the said city, in the sum of $13,861.24, said sum being the amount of certain postage stamps, postal-savings stamps, war-savings stamps, war-tax revenue stamps, and cash, from the money-order funds taken and stolen by unknown burglars, on or about 4 o'clock in the morning of the 23d day of October, 1918, from one of the branch post offices of the said city of Minneapolis, to wit: That certain branch post office located at Nos. 621 and 623 First Avenue north, in said city, and commonly known and described as the traffic station; and that the said Edward A. Purdy be, and he is hereby, released from payment to the Treasury of the United States of the said sum of $13,861.24 and every part thereof as such postmaster, and that his account in connection with the aforesaid traffic station branch post office be credited with the said amount of $13,861.24 by reason of the aforesaid loss caused by the said burglars.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

VAN DORN IRON WORKS CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9257) for the relief of the Van Dorn Iron Works Co.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. I will reserve the right to object.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill for the payment of $3,052.50 for 555 mail-package boxes, at $5.50 per box, which were manufactured by the Van Dorn Iron Works Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, and which are furnished the Government, and which the Government has used for many years. These were furnished by the Columbia Supply Co. to the Government. The iron works did not have a contract with the Post Office Department. It was discovered that the Columbia Supply Co. contract, together with the other Post Office supply contracts, was procured by fraud, but there has been no fraud on the part of the Van Dorn Iron Works Co. The Columbia Co. has gone out of business, and their rights against the Government have lapsed.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I notice in this report that the price paid by the Government was $5.50, but the contract price of the Government with this defunct supply company was $10.80 a box.

Mr. EMERSON. Something like that.

Mr. HICKS. With a price of $5.50 per box was this company making any money out of that contract?

Mr. EMERSON. I can not say. They are simply trying to get the money.

Mr. BLANTON. Can not the gentleman settle this claim by sending this company some valuable 1919 yearbooks?

Mr. EMERSON. I do not know. This company has furnished these materials to the Government. There is no fraud on the part of the Van Dorn Iron Works Co., as the report shows. They took this contract from the Columbia Supply Co. That company is charged with fraud, but there is no fraud on the part of the Van Dorn Iron Works Co. Whether or not they made any money out of it I do not know. The man who represents the company appeared before the committee and presented his claim. I never appeared before the committee at all nor heard the testimony on it. I think the report of the committee should be sustained. I think the claim should be paid.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I have read the report, and it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, it would be rather questionable to pass this bill.

Mr. McKINIRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. McKINIRY. I reported this claim, and I do not think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON] has accurately stated the claim.

Mr. EMERSON. The gentleman may be right.

Mr. McKINIRY. The Van Dorn Iron Works Co. was a subcontractor. This contract was directly between the Post Office Department and the Columbia Supply Co. On the discovery of the fraud which was involved here the Columbia Supply Co. pressed a suit in the Court of Claims, and in that litigation the Court of Claims refused to give judgment to the Columbia Supply Co. for the full contract price of these boxes. That was the contract price of $8.80. But at that time the Court of Claims stated that the Columbia Supply Co. could, if there had been no fraud, have recovered. The Van Dorn Iron Works Co. simply had a contract to deliver these boxes to the Columbia Supply Co., and the Columbia Supply Co. had the contract with the Post Office Department. The Van Dorn Iron Works Co. was simply a manufacturer and had no part whatever in any fraud. It furnished these boxes to the Government, and the Government has received them and used them. The price here claimed by the Van Dorn Iron Works Co. is its manufacturer's price, and not the contract price that the Columbia Supply Co. engaged to furnish the boxes to the Post Office Department for.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKINIRY. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Would not the action for recovery raised against the Columbia Supply Co. run against the Government?

Mr. McKINIRY. Ordinarily that would be true, but in this case, as the affidavit shows, attached to the report, the Columbia Supply Co. was simply a dummy for a man by the name of McGeehan. McGeehan was indicted, and the treasurer of the Columbia Supply Co. committed suicide. The company is defunct. There is no doubt but that the Columbia Supply Co. was involved in the fraud. It has gone out of existence and has no assets. Therefore the Van Dorn Iron Works Co. has no one to whom it has recourse for recovery of this money but the Government.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. McKINIRY. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Did the Government ever pay the claim of the Columbia Supply Co. for these specific boxes?

Mr. McKINIRY. No. The report shows that the Government has never paid anybody one penny for these boxes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKINIRY. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Do I understand that the Van Dorn Iron Works Co. delivered these boxes directly to the Post Office Department?

Mr. McKINIRY. Yes; but there was no privity of contract between the Van Dorn Iron Works Co. and the Post Office Department.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes; but the Post Office Department received the boxes. Why did not the Van Dorn Iron Works Co. bring its claim against the Post Office Department and get paid for it?

Mr. McKINIRY. It did present its claim.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Why did not the Government pay it?

Mr. McKINIRY. The Post Office Department refused to pay this because there was no contract between it and the Van Dorn Iron Works Co.

Mr. RAMSEYER. There was a contract between the Post Office Department and the Columbia Supply Co.?

Mr. McKINIRY. Yes. The gentleman will understand that there was a huge fraud not only with regard to this contract but with regard to others, and for years litigation in regard to that fraud has been going on. Under the circumstances the Post Office Department refused to pay anyone and allowed each simply his legal redress. The statute of limitations has run, and the Van Dorn Iron Works Co. has no one now to look to except the Government for the recovery of this money.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Were these boxes tainted with this fraud?

Mr. McKINIRY. The boxes, of course, were the subject matter of the fraud.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I mean the manufacture?

Mr. McKINIRY. The report of the Acting Postmaster General states specifically that the Van Dorn Iron Works Co. was innocent in the whole transaction.

Mr. WALSH. What has become of the liability of the Columbia Supply Co.?

Mr. McKINIRY. That liability still exists. The Columbia Supply Co., I will state, did sue in the Court of Claims.

Mr. EMERSON. That decision was adverse to them.

Mr. SIEGEL. As to the Van Dorn Iron Works Co., the Columbia Supply people had no cause of action?

Mr. McKINIRY. No cause of action.

Mr. BLANTON. How much more is this claim than this claimant would receive from the Columbia Supply Co.?

Mr. McKINIRY. It is exactly the same amount.

Mr. BLANTON. It is exactly the contract price?

Mr. McKINIRY. Yes; it is exactly the contract price, no more and no less.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the Postmaster General recommend the payment of this claim under restrictions?

Mr. McKINIRY. Yes. Subsequently the Post Office Department purchased other boxes from the Van Dorn Iron Works Co. at exactly the same price.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKINIRY. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. As indicating the true value of the boxes, did not the Government afterwards purchase the same kind of boxes from this company at the same price?

Mr. McKINIRY. Yes; the Government has done that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I think I shall object. I appreciate the information that has been given, but——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FRANK S. BOWKER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 696) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Frank S. Bowker.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,759.80 to Frank S. Bowker, of Phippsburg, Me., as managing owner of the schooner William H. Davenport, and of the cargo thereof, for the damages caused to said schooner and her cargo of lumber by a collision with the United States lighthouse steamer Azalea, which occurred on the 2d day of October, 1899, as found by the Court of Claims and reported in House Document No. 334 of the Sixty-fifth Congress, first session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

NEW JERSEY SHIPBUILDING & DREDGING CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10989) for the relief of the owner of a drill boat known as drill boat No. 3 and a dredge known as dredge No. 9.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table an identical Senate bill (S. 3472).

Mr. GARD. May we have this bill reported first?

Mr. WALSH. Let us have this bill reported first and see whether consent is given to consider it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has asked to take the Senate bill from the Speaker's table.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Let the Senate bill be reported.

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I think the Senate bill should be first reported.

Mr. EDMONDS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table S. 3472, which is identical with this bill, and which has passed the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. 3472) for the relief of the owner of a drill boat known as drill boat No. 3 and a dredge known as dredge No. 9.

Mr. BLANTON. Is this the companion bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. This is an identical Senate bill.

The Clerk read the bill S. 3472, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the New Jersey Shipbuilding & Dredging Co., of Bayonne, N. J., owner of a drill boat, known as drill boat No. 3, and a dredge, known as dredge No. 9, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $118,309.16 to reimburse said owner of drill boat No. 3 and dredge No. 9 for loss sustained as a result of damages suffered by said drill boat No. 3 and said dredge No. 9 through collision with the United States Navy barge Nahunta in tow of the U. S. S. Woodcock, off Halletts Point, New York Harbor, on April 19, 1919.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, when did this Senate bill come over?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the Chair that it came over on February 6.

Mr. WALSH. And the House bill was reported January 13, 1920?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill involves quite a large sum of money—$118,000. Has there ever been an adjudication of it?

Mr. EDMONDS. By the Navy Department.

Mr. BLANTON. I mean an adjudication by the Court of Claims?

Mr. EDMONDS. It has not been sent to the Court of Claims.

Mr. BLANTON. In view of the fact that it involves $118,000, is it not the idea of the chairman of the Committee on Claims that this ought to go to the Court of Claims for adjudication?

Mr. EDMONDS. I should like to say to the gentleman from Texas that this case appeals to me particularly because it involves the sinking of dredges working in the opening of Hell Gate in New York Harbor. These dredges were anchored permanently at certain points.

Mr. BLANTON. The fact that they were in Hell Gate would not affect the claim any more than if they were in some other gate, would it?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; but the question of continuing the dredging at that point is involved, because the contractor is financially involved in the loss. If we send this to the Court of Claims it may be 6, 8, or 12 months that the work will be delayed while the contractor is securing the money to continue his contract.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Speaker, there were six weeks of hearings by Navy boards on this claim. The commander of the naval ship was ordered to be court-martialed, and court-martial proceedings were held.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not discussing the question of who was to blame or anything of that kind. I am discussing the amount and measure of damages.

Mr. MACCRATE. After that the claim was referred to the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, and they sent their accountants to this place. The Army and Navy officials are superintending this work as it goes along. They have taken every item and have checked up all the bolts, screws, nuts, and everything else, down to the smallest amount. The Navy Department is urging the passage of this bill for the reason that this contractor has suffered $500,000 worth of damage in this place where 30 of these accidents have occurred, and this money must be paid in order to enable the contractor to go on with his work.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the Secretary of the Navy recommend the payment of this amount?

Mr. MACCRATE. The Secretary of the Navy approves the finding and recommends the payment of this amount.

Mr. TILSON. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this statement of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy:

In view of the fact that the record indicated that the Navy is clearly responsible for the damages suffered by the claimant as a result of the said collision, and further that the claimant is engaged in important Government work in deepening and widening the Hell Gate Channel, I have the honor to recommend that the bill receive favorable consideration by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the bill provide that this shall be accepted in full settlement of the matter?

Mr. MACCRATE. I do not know that that language is in the bill, but I have no objection to it.

Mr. BLANTON. If it is not in the bill, you would not object to such an amendment?

Mr. MACCRATE. I would not object to an amendment including those words, limiting it to this particular injury for this occurrence of April 19, 1919.

Mr. PARRISH. Reserving the right to object, I believe the gentleman from New York stated that there were other accidents at this same place. Why is it that they are having so many accidents here?

Mr. MACCRATE. Since November 19, 1919, the number of accidents has lessened because the War Department has issued instruction to all craft coming through Hell Gate to be careful. This company itself before this accident sent to all craft a notice that they were operating there and that their cables were laid, and asking all craft to avoid this place. But in a very short space of time, during the war especially, because of the heavy traffic in that part of the river, there were so many boats coming down they tried to pass three abreast, and they were not careful of the moorings.

Mr. PARRISH. How many accidents did the gentleman state there were?

Mr. MACCRATE. About 30. Since November 19, when the War Department issued strict orders that they were not to go past with a speed of over six knots an hour, there have been no accidents.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, in order that the gentleman may have fuller information, let me say that right at this point at Hell Gate, when the tide is either flood or ebb and running strong, the Harlem River comes in from the westward, and the tide running out into the East River makes an offset on the Brooklyn side, and it is almost impossible to keep vessels straight either on a flood or an ebb tide on account of the Harlem River.

Mr. PARRISH. Have there been any other accidents in which the damages were as large as this?

Mr. MACCRATE. No. In this particular case the Woodcock, the United States boat, was pulling a barge, and a danger signal was given by a New Haven Railroad boat. The commander of the United States boat thought it was a passing signal and responded with a passing signal. The New Haven boat started to pass and the commander of the United States boat, realizing the danger, stopped all the engines suddenly and the rope broke, and it turned against the boat of the claimant, and the boat and the barge went down straight against the rocks where most of the damage occurred.

Mr. PARRISH. Have they settled the other claims?

Mr. MACCRATE. They have settled some of the others on the same basis, because the Shipping Board had one of these claims and they figured out the cost, and those figures have been reinvestigated by the Navy Department.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in order to get some additional information, I note on page 5 of the report "that the total claim for damages made by the New Jersey Shipbuilding, Repairing & Dredging Co. in the sum of $122,826 is excessive, and includes sundry items which are not proper claims against the Government." What court was that?

Mr. MACCRATE. That was the Navy Board of Claims. They had an investigating board, and they recommended that four thousand odd dollars should be cut off.

Mr. GARD. The report further says that the court is unable to determine the correctness and reasonableness of the various items making up the total claim for damages of the New Jersey Shipbuilding, Repairing & Dredging Co., as set forth in exhibit 10, but tentatively adopt the figures given in exhibit No. 10, excepting the items mentioned in paragraph "h."

Mr. MACCRATE. Thereafter the Navy caused an inspection division to investigate, and they made a recommendation that instead of the one hundred and twenty-two thousand and some odd dollars it should be reduced to $118,000.

Mr. GARD. Is the gentleman satisfied that the sum of $118,000 now found to be due by the naval authorities is after complete investigation of the case?

Mr. MACCRATE. Yes; and in addition we have the recommendation by the department.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to take the bill from the Speaker's table and consider it?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the New Jersey Shipbuilding & Dredging Co., of Bayonne, N. J., owner of a drill boat, known as drill boat No. 3, and a dredge, known as dredge No. 9, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $118,309.16 to reimburse said owner of drill boat No. 3 and dredge No. 9 for loss sustained as a result of damages suffered by said drill boat No. 3 and said dredge No. 9 through collision with the United States Navy barge Nahunta, in tow of the U. S. S. Woodcock, off Halletts Point, New York Harbor, on April 19, 1919.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: At the conclusion of the bill strike out the period, add a semicolon, and the following: "such sum to be in full settlement for all damages arising from said alleged injury."

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion? After the figures "$118,000" add the words "in full settlement."

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; Mr. Speaker, I ask to modify my amendment. After the figures "$118,000" add the following: "in full settlement."

Mr. MACCRATE. Let me suggest that after the words "dredge No. 9 for loss sustained" you put in the words "in full settlement."

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the same purpose is attained by leaving the bill as it is. If this slight amendment is put on, it means that the bill must go back to the Senate, and we do not know how long it will take. If the gentleman's amendment served any real purpose, I would not oppose it.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Connecticut has overlooked the fact that our friends at the other end of the Capitol may act with great dispatch when they have the willingness to do so. How long did it take them to pass the last big appropriation bill?

Mr. TILSON. It takes us longer to pass a little bill on the Private Calendar than it does to pass a big appropriation bill, because Private Calendar days are so rare.

Mr. BLANTON. I think it would be much better to place safeguards around this legislation, even if it causes the Senate a little trouble to possibly meet for five minutes, than to have these claimants in this bill come here with further claims before the committee. Therefore I insist on my amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the figures "$118,309.16," insert the words "in full settlement."

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, we will accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The bill H. R. 10989, similar to the Senate bill, was ordered to lie on the table.

WENDELL PHILLIPS LODGE, KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9794) for the relief of Wendell Phillips Lodge, No. 365, Knights of Pythias.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether the situation with reference to this bill is substantially this: This lodge wanted to present an ambulance to the War Department for use by the department or the Red Cross, and had ordered the ambulance of the motor-car manufacturers. After they had placed the order the War Department issued a regulation prohibiting officials from accepting these gifts, and the lodge wants the Government to appropriate $381.65, the amount which they have expended for the body of the ambulance.

Mr. MACCRATE. The statement of the gentleman is correct, except that the Government has the body of the ambulance.

Mr. WALSH. They were going to give it to the Government in any event.

Mr. MACCRATE. And in addition to that, when the order of the War Department came out saying it would not accept these gifts from private individuals or associations, this lodge then said, "We will take that money and buy another ambulance and give it to the American Red Cross." They did that. They took the same amount of money and bought another ambulance and gave it to the American Red Cross, expecting that they would get back this money that they had already expended.

Mr. WALSH. What gave rise to any such expectation as that?

Mr. MACCRATE. Only because they never dreamed, and I suppose no reasonable creature would dream that once the Government had refused to accept the gift it would accept a part of it. They did not expect that the Government would accept the chassis and reject the body.

Mr. WALSH. And the Government did that?

Mr. MACCRATE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And the lodge is kicking because the Government did not take the whole thing?

Mr. MACCRATE. No; they are not. They are objecting only to this: They appropriated out of their lodge fund a specific sum of money for one ambulance. They had only that amount of money to expend for that purpose. Relying on the proposition that the Government would not take anything, they concluded that they would give the ambulance to the American Red Cross. Now, instead of giving one ambulance, they find they have given one ambulance and the body of another ambulance.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If the Government refused to take it, how does the Government have it?

Mr. MACCRATE. The Government had contracted with a certain contractor for a great many of these parts, and this part was one that the contractor sent to the Government.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Then the Government should pay that contractor. How does the Government refuse to take a thing and then have it?

Mr. MACCRATE. Only because the lodge used the same contractor. They were told to order the body from a certain contractor with whom the Government was doing business. This contractor made the body and delivered it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The contractor had a contract with the Government and with the lodge. The lodge can not be held responsible for a body that was delivered to the Government.

Mr. MACCRATE. Oh, yes; because it was the lodge that ordered it, and it was delivered to the Government at the lodge's request.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But the Government refused to take it at the lodge's request.

Mr. MACCRATE. No; one department of the Government——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is what the report says.

Mr. MACCRATE. One department of the Government was working at odds with another department. One was accepting the gift of ambulances. The War Department then promulgated an order that no more gifts should be accepted.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Which department was accepting these ambulances?

Mr. MACCRATE. The Medical Department.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is the War Department.

Mr. MACCRATE. Yes; but two branches or divisions of the same department were working at odds.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. One took them, and the War Department regulations said they could not take them. Is that the way of it?

Mr. MACCRATE. That is the way of it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In any event the lodge lost the ambulance.

Mr. MACCRATE. It lost part of the money that it had in its treasury, and the Government has something for that money.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, I suppose the Government has given it away by this time.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, do I understand that the Government received from this contractor one more body than it paid for?

Mr. MACCRATE. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. TILSON. Did the Government receive the body that this lodge paid for?

Mr. MACCRATE. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. The Government received it and the lodge paid for it?

Mr. MACCRATE. Yes; and the contractor says that the lodge has no claim against it because it did the work it agreed to do for the lodge.

Mr. TILSON. And furnished the body to the Government?

Mr. MACCRATE. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. And the Government accepted it?

Mr. MACCRATE. The Government has accepted that part of it.

Mr. TILSON. And has never paid for it?

Mr. MACCRATE. Has never paid for it.

Mr. FOCHT. And the lodge did.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, this lodge endeavored to perform a very generous, patriotic service. There is no question about that. Its members were imbued with the highest motives, and because of the delay, probably, in giving notification of the change of attitude on the part of the War Department, the General Motors Co. shipped this body to the War Department along with a lot of other bodies that the War Department had ordered. The lodge was intending to make this gift anyway to the Government, and the Government got the body despite the change in the regulations and evidently made use of it. I can not quite see why, because the Secretary of War declined to accept an entire ambulance, both the chassis and body, but did accept part of the ambulance, the body, the lodge should now ask the Government to come in and pay for the part that it did get.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The lodge wanted to give an ambulance to the Government if it would take it directly. The Government declined to take it, and then the lodge wanted to give the ambulance to the Government indirectly through giving it to the Red Cross. Through some confusion in the War Department the Government received an additional ambulance. After all, is there any reason why we should make the lodge, desiring to do a very patriotic thing, suffer for the trouble in the War Department, which got another ambulance and needed it?

It seems to me that we might well encourage these organizations in their patriotic efforts to give something free to the Government directly or indirectly, and by giving it to the American Red Cross they are giving it indirectly, and then being satisfied to receive an ambulance to endeavor to give——

Mr. MACCRATE. Give a coat and take a cloak also. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit, this lodge, as he understands, is a fraternal organization. They set aside so much money for war work.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman answer a question? Did they, in fact, spend money for a completed ambulance and make a gift to the Red Cross?

Mr. MACCRATE. They gave a completed ambulance to the Red Cross after the refusal of the War Department to accept the gift.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I will not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the bill in its present form meet the demands of the War Department in section 2 and section 5 of the report, wherein it states:

> It seems that if possible the Anderson Electric Car Co. should be allowed to charge to the Government $381.63 which was paid by the Wendell Phillips Lodge, or to turn over to them the completed ambulance body.

It seems this is a case that when the Government decided not to accept any more gifts of these ambulances the General Motors Truck Co. returned the money paid by the Wendell Phillips Lodge for it; that this Anderson Truck Co., or whatever it is—Anderson Electric Car Co.—refused to return the money which the lodge had paid to it, so that thereby the body of the truck went to the Government anyhow, where the lodge wanted it to go. Now, if there is to be any return at all, should not we adopt the suggestion of the major of the Motor Transport Corps, so that this same money should be required to be refunded from the Anderson Electric Car Co. to this Wendell Phillips Lodge? I think the lodge is trying to do a very excellent and patriotic thing, and that seems to be what should be done.

Mr. MACCRATE. From a purely legal standpoint, the Pythian lodge would have no claim against them even for the return of the money back from this body company.

Mr. GARD. Well, now, apparently what the Pythian lodge wants now is to get back the money paid for the body. They have got the money back for the truck part, but they did not get the money back for their body. Now they want the money for the body.

Mr. MACCRATE. If you authorize the payment of this amount of money to the body company you would not be able to give the Pythian lodge a cause of action against them unless you made it conditional in your bill.

Mr. GARD. That is what the major of the Transport Corps says—that we should pay the body company the sum of money with the reservation that it be transferred to this lodge.

Mr. MACCRATE. Well, it seems that would be doing indirectly something he might not have thought of, namely, giving a cause of action to the lodge. Now, the Pythian lodge has no right against these people to get the money. The safest and surest way to get it paid into their hands is by this method.

Mr. GARD. As I understand it, the Pythian lodge wanted to donate an ambulance and bought a body, and the War Department was opposed to receiving this ambulance and the General Motors Co. gave them back the money. The Anderson Electric Car Co. would not give them back the money. Now they want the money back from the Government.

Mr. MACCRATE. Because the Government got the body.

Mr. GARD. I understand the Government got the body finally, because the Anderson Car Co. claims they have fulfilled the contract with the Pythian lodge and refuse to return the money and insist that the body company——

Mr. MACCRATE. If they gave the money back to the Anderson Body Co., the Pythian lodge would be still left high and dry, because it has no legal claim against the Anderson Co.

Mr. GARD. It has no legal claim against anybody.

Mr. MACCRATE. No claim of any kind.

Mr. GARD. It has no existing claim now. This is purely a matter of taking from the Government some money and giving it back to this lodge, and I think that probably would be good, because the lodge acted in a very patriotic spirit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $381.65 which was paid by the Wendell Phillips Lodge for the body of an ambulance which under the law the Federal Government could not accept.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

HARVEY R. BUTCHER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10115) for the relief of Harvey R. Butcher.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Harvey R. Butcher, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,770.33 for the payment in full of the claim of said Harvey R. Butcher, being a claim for reimbursement of the sum of $1,770.33 paid by the said Harvey R. Butcher out of his personal funds in settlement of an alleged shortage in his accounts while acting as disbursing officer, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, at Camp Funston, the said shortage not being due to any negligence or default on his part.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 6, after the figures "$1,770.33," strike out "for the payment in full of the claim of said Harvey R. Butcher, being a claim for reimbursement of the sum of $1,770.33 paid by the said Harvey R. Butcher out" and insert "to reimburse him for moneys paid out." In line 10, after the word "of," strike out "an alleged" and insert "a."

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

W. LOAIZA & CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11067) to refund certain duties paid by W. Loaiza & Co.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, this seems to be a matter, as I gather from the reading of the report, where W. Loaiza & Co. imported what was supposed to be merchandise paying a dutiable rate of 25 cents per bushel, as under the law applicable to black-eyed beans, and later discovered that it should be assessed for duty on peas, at the rate of 10 cents per bushel instead of 25 cents per bushel, but that no protest was made and no application for refund or for action ever taken by this firm until this present bill was offered for relief.

Mr. ELSTON. I think the gentleman is in error in the statement in regard to the fact that no application was made for the refund. If the gentleman will read the letter of the collector of the port, at the end of the report on this bill, he will see that there is a reasonable excuse there given for the fact that no protest was made. It seems that the importer was the agent of the real purchaser in New York; that the importer had no more than a mere formal function to perform, and did not examine the consignment and did not check it in any particular; that the provisional rates were paid there on a classification made by the collector of the port of San Francisco, and there was no responsible person there to check his provisional classification. Later, when the consignment got to New York and it was found that a wrong classification had been made, the presumption here is that it was too late to make the protest in the time required by law.

An application was made, but it was denied by reason of the fact that the application was made too late. Now it appears, on account of all the circumstances that I have mentioned, this importer has paid to the Government of the United States a sum of something over $800 more than he should have paid, and it is clearly an overpayment which should be returned to him, and it would have been returned to him if it had not been for these equitable circumstances which excuse him for not having made the protest.

Mr. GARD. The matter arises, as I view it, from what is said in the letter of L. S. Rowe, acting secretary, that:

No timely protest having been filed, however, the liquidation was final and conclusive against all persons interested, as provided in paragraph N, Section III, of the tariff act, and the department was unable to grant relief.

And that is supplemented by the language of Mr. Davis, collector, that there was no application for reliquidation within the one-year limitation period. So that the period of one-year limitation had been allowed to pass by these importers, and nothing was done until as the acting secretary said:

The case is typical of many others where the importers have failed to take the necessary steps provided by law to protect their interests and secure a correction of erroneous assessments of duty.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman read the following from the letter of the collector, which says that the applicant further said:

The merchandise in question did not belong to W. Loaiza & Co., of San Francisco, the importers, but were to be forwarded to W. Loaiza & Co., of New York.

And that it was not discovered, for reasons given in the letter, that the consignment had been erroneously classified. And the implication from the whole of the letter of the collector is that it was an excusable oversight in not making the protest. I do not see anything here that indicates the application was not made and indication given to the applicant that he might be too late.

I will state to the gentleman that this bill was introduced by me at the request of responsible persons, and I made no personal appearance before the Claims Committee at all, but the committee reported this bill out on its merits and on the documents they had before them, and I did not know it was reported at all until I saw it on the calendar.

Mr. GARD. It seems to me if we accepted the case as being typical, we would open wide the door to reliquidation of assessments at the port of entry where a man has not availed himself of the proceedings guaranteed to him by law in the statutory period. Therefore I object.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may go to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman that under the rule it will remain on the calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 7656) to repeal the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, and to provide for the disposition of all property acquired under and by virtue of the same, had requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. FERNALD, Mr. SPENCER, and Mr. TRAMMELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota reported the bill (H. R. 13266) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

PRIVATE CALENDAR—BENJAMIN O. KERLEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 25) for the relief of Benjamin O. Kerlee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentlemen of the committee how they arrived at the amount fixed as the basis for payment of this man for injuries received?

Mr. EDMONDS. We did not arrive at any amount from any judgment of our own. The Senate bill was for $1,200, and we thought that that was really what was due the man under the circumstances, as he had been permanently injured. He received $100 a month for 10 months, which, in addition to this $1,200 asked for, would make $2,200.

Mr. WALSH. How did he get the $1,000?

Mr. EDMONDS. He was given a year's pay under the regular law.

Mr. WALSH. Under the compensation act?

Mr. EDMONDS. I presume so.

Mr. WALSH. If he has already received what is due him under the general law, I do not think we ought to come in with a special bill and add to that compensation.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is what they have done in this case. It seemed to be a special case and deserving of special consideration, and the committee gave it special consideration. He has received $1,000, which was 10 months' pay while he was in the hospital, and that was full compensation under the law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Under the law the pay is not confined to 10 months; that is, under the old law it was not. Is it the policy of the Committee on Claims, where a man who is injured has received full compensation allowed by the general law, to bring in a private bill for an additional amount?

Mr. EDMONDS. It is not the policy, but we have done so at times. We did so in 1914 and 1915 in some Panama Canal cases.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I know it was done at times, and most of these bills were objected to and never passed. As I understood when this matter was up, the Committee on Claims was not going to do that any more. That is what we have a general law for.

Mr. EDMONDS. We have tried to keep away from bringing in any extra compensation.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But, of course, every time you allow one, everybody else who is injured wants his claim allowed for an additional amount. It is perfectly natural.

Mr. WALSH. I regret that this former employee has been in rather pitiable circumstances. According to the report, this gratuity will not any more than enable him to pay some indebtedness that he has outstanding. But he has come under the general provisions of the law and has received what the law gave him, and I do not think that we ought to embark upon this policy of supplementing that by special legislation, and therefore I shall object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

KATIE NORVALL.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1546) for the relief of Katie Norvall.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLANTON. May we have the bill reported, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be reported in case there is no objection.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course, it can be reported.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask that the bill be reported, so that we can understand what we are to pass upon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,173.12 as full compensation to Katie Norvall for the death of her husband, G. Norvall, who was drowned while engaged in the performance of his duties as fireman and engineer, as a result of a collision between the navy-yard launch Highlander and the ferryboat Vallejo near the Mare Island ferry slip, Vallejo, Calif.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I understand this compensation is fixed on the basis of a year's pay?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. When did this accident occur?

Mr. EDMONDS. In 1907—May 14.

Mr. BLANTON. That is about 13 years ago?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. There was no compensation law then. The only law we had then was for one year's pay.

Mr. BLANTON. This is another one of the cases that the gentleman is talking about, behind the compensation law?

Mr. EDMONDS. No. There was a compensation law in 1907, I believe, allowing one year's pay.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There was no compensation law then.

Mr. BLANTON. There was no compensation law at that time.

Mr. EDMONDS. Was there not a law in 1907 which gave a man compensation when he was employed in a hazardous occupation and was injured?

Mr. BLANTON. There was no such law at that time.

Mr. EDMONDS. I understand there has always been a law of that kind on the statute books.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is mistaken about that, clearly. Then the Committee on Claims did not realize, when they reported this bill, that they were establishing a precedent by this bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. We are not establishing a precedent by this bill. We have granted hundreds of claims of this kind since I have been a member of this committee.

Mr. BLANTON. What does the gentleman say about hundreds of other claims of this character coming up?

Mr. EDMONDS. There are not many of them.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows there are a great many of them waiting for each one to pass here.

Mr. EDMONDS. I venture to say that the House passed 50 or 60 claims of this kind since I have been a member of the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. For the present, Mr. Speaker, I shall object to this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next one.

CAPT. FREDERICK B. SHAW.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2343) for the relief of Capt. Frederick B. Shaw.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Frederick B. Shaw, United States Army, the sum of $356.50, which sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, said sum to be payment in full for all losses of personal property incurred by him by reason of the sinking of the United States transport Meade in the harbor of Ponce, P. R., on or about May 16, 1899: Provided, That the accounting officer of the Treasury shall require a schedule and affidavit from him, such schedule to be approved by the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 0.

So the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next one.

FORREST R. BLACK.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9904) for the relief of Forrest R. Black.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield me six minutes?

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman can take time. I have no time.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. You can not yield six minutes. Five minutes is the limit.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think I should call the attention of the House to——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Did the gentleman reserve the right to object?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. I have asked recognition from the Chair on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question was whether there was objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman can not do that.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, may we have the bill reported, so that we will know what it is?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be read for information merely.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Forrest R. Black, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $142, in reimbursement for money and valuables lost while they were properly in the custody of the United States Government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] reserve the right to object?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I ask for recognition.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman can strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It has been reported.

Mr. BLANTON. It has already been reported, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been reported for information, not for consideration. The Clerk will again report it.

The bill was again read.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the few Members present, barely more than a handful comparatively, prompt me to call attention to the fact that when we do set aside a day for the consideration of the Private Calendar it is the cue for a great many of our colleagues to leave or go home, and those who remain for the consideration of the bills are mostly our colleagues who are interested in these various private measures. That makes, after all, a kind of a packed jury. How far would a man get if he were to make objection to one of these bills of our friends who are here, each one especially interested in a bill and wanting to pass it?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a minute I will. I want to call attention to a story I heard. A number of years ago this same transaction occurred, when the House set apart a certain day for the consideration of private bills, and each Member after he got his bill passed would get up and leave. Finally, when the last bill was called and the last Member present got his bill passed, out of the door he went. The Speaker chased him down the central aisle, beat him to the outside entrance, and said, "Hold on here; come back here. Hell, you are not going to leave me here with nobody to adjourn the House!" [Laughter.] That is pretty near the situation here to-day. We are going to keep on dwindling down and dwindling down until we will not have anybody here to adjourn the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman made the statement a while ago that a man would not get very far if he made an objection. The fact is that anybody can object to any bill that comes up for consideration, and it can not come up if he objects.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; it can. The gentleman from Illinois knows well that he or any other Member present can keep a bill from coming up to-day, but on the next private bill day he may object his head off and he can not keep it from coming up, because it comes up then as a matter of right on the next claims day. Then the gentleman would have here to pass on the merits of the bill his fellow colleagues, the few of them who were present, as they always are here on claims day, almost every one of them interested in a private bill, and every one of them knowing that if he voted against any other colleague's bill it would invite opposition from that colleague to his own measure. I say it is a very unfortunate situation for us to find ourselves in.

Mr. MADDEN. He can object on the second day just as well as he can on the first.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; because these bills are not considered by unanimous consent on regular claims days. On regular claims days they come up as a matter of right, and it is then not necessary to request unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, for fear some one reading the RECORD—if the gentleman puts his remarks in the RECORD—might think that the incident which the gentleman related ever occurred, I want to say that it is purely the result of the gentleman's vivid imagination.

Mr. BLANTON. I was told that story by the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming, the great majority leader of this House, as a true incident in the history of this House.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman makes the statement that he was told that by the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] told me that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think that is another illustration of the gentleman's vivid imagination. I simply wish to say that that incident never occurred. Now, as a matter of fact, there are a very respectable number of Members of the House present, and a very high quality of membership of the House present, certainly not all of them interested in claims. I do not believe the gentleman from Texas has any claim on the calendar. I may be mistaken. I know I have none. I know too much to have one. I know many Members here who would hesitate long about introducing a private bill of any kind. I simply do not want people to get the impression that these bills are considered with no one here, after they have been reported from the committee, though I agree in many respects with the gentleman from Texas that Members with bills on the calendar are more numerously represented usually on Private Calendar day than Members without bills on the calendar.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Texas has said, as he frequently says, that there are only a handful of Members present, and I suppose he would appeal for evidence of that to the record of the number who voted on the demand for a division. Now, I observed that there were a large number of gentlemen present who did not rise at the behest of the gentleman from Texas when he demanded the division.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will yield, I will test it the first time there is a vote, and we will see exactly how many there are here, and then, if it is necessary, I will have a roll call.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is the gentleman's privilege, if he desires to delay the transaction of the public business.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio what is his estimate as to the number of men here? Are there 100 men now on the floor? There certainly are not 100 men here out of the membership of 435.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that the Speaker pro tempore, who is an honest ex-judge, will give us a fair count.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 71, noes none.

Accordingly the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I merely desire to remark, Mr. Speaker, that there were gentlemen who did not rise to vote.

Mr. BLANTON. Four in number. I counted them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is all out of order. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. BEGG, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

KING COAL CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6077) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the claim of the King Coal Co., of San Francisco, Calif.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I notice that the committee has by an amendment proposed to send this matter to the district court of the United States for the northern district of California for an adjudication. Is that because the amount stated in the original bill was less than what the actual damage was?

Mr. ELSTON. No; it was not. The bill was introduced with certain evidence, which consisted mainly of the certificates of the various naval boards who estimated the damages and admitted the liability of the Government and recommended that the claim be paid. It was supposed that that evidence was sufficient for the committee to pass favorably on the bill. When the bill was introduced the regular request for a report from the Secretary of the Navy was made, and his letter comes in recommending that, in view of the fact that there was mixture of liability, it would be better to have the case tried in the United States court. It was my opinion on reading over the evidence that it was a clear case of liability upon the part of the Government.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has read the evidence?

Mr. ELSTON. I have read the findings of the Navy Board. Under the bill, the case goes to the district court for a regular trial on its merits. The claimant should be given his day in court, especially in view of the fact that the Secretary of the Navy practically admits in his letter that there is a liability.

Mr. WALSH. There is no sound basis in the contention that because a man has an accident or a collision, and the Secretary of the Navy says that the Navy Department is at fault, it does not necessarily follow that the Government should be sued or that we should consent to it. We just passed an act a few days ago, and I think we just corrected it by a concurrent resolution, which, of course, would not apply to this particular case; but I wanted to ask the gentleman with reference to this damage. He states that he has read the evidence. Was there any general concurrence in fixing the damages at $24,126.29?

Mr. ELSTON. My memory is that there was a bill of particulars setting forth all the items of damage, and that those items were checked by the Naval Board and found to be correct.

Mr. WALSH. And it was agreed upon?

Mr. ELSTON. That is my recollection. The gentleman realizes that the King Coal Co. is put to suit and must establish by due process of law what the damage was and whether the Government is liable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the King Coal Co., of San Francisco, Calif., the sum of $21,126.29 in full compensation for the claim of the said King Coal Co. against the United States for the sinking by the United States submarine R–19 of the barge Ruth, belonging to said King Coal Co.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, strike out all of lines 3 to 10, inclusive, and insert the following: "That the claim of the King Coal Co., of San Francisco, Calif., owner of the barge Ruth, against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between the said barge and the United States submarine R–19 in San Francisco Harbor, may be sued for by the said King Coal Co. in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the King Coal Co., or against the King Coal Co. in favor of the United States upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between the private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from California a question. It says "upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between the private parties." Is not the word "the" surplusage?

Mr. ELSTON. I can not answer for this part of the bill. That is in the amendment proposed by the committee. I should say to strike out the word "the" would make it better.

Mr. WALSH. There are no other private parties involved in this accident according to the report, and that language would seem to refer to the parties involved in this litigation.

Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out the word "the," on line 15, page 2, after the word "between."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 15, strike out the word "the" after the word "between."

Mr. McKEOWN. Does not that language give a broader right; does it not extend the rule of negligence?

Mr. WALSH. It gives the King Coal Co. the right to sue the United States in admiralty under the same rules as would apply between private parties.

Mr. McKEOWN. That is all right; I did not know but that it extended the right.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think so.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, now that our friends who were called in from the cloakroom for counting a while ago have returned thereto, and our friends who claimed a while ago that they remained seated during the vote are no longer sitting or standing on the floor, and since the question was raised as to the number of our colleagues actually present, I want to say that this is a matter so easily discernible in a definite way that we should not quibble about it. If we have but a small number here, we ought to admit it. If you will exclude the Members of the Senate who happen to be present, if you will exclude the Sergeant at Arms and the Doorkeeper and the employees of the House, and count only the membership of this House right now, we have but 62 Members present, counting the Acting Speaker, by actual count. What is the use of quibbling about that? Of course, when I raised the question a while ago and we had a count on a division, Members were called in from the cloakrooms. They always respond when they are called, because they are patriotic; but when we have but 62, why claim a greater number; why not admit it?

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman surely does not want to exclude the Senators present.

Mr. BLANTON. They do not count on a vote. They outvote us at the other end of the Capitol, and the gentleman from Kansas certainly ought not to want to include them here also.

Mr. TINCHER. I am quite sure they would not exclude us if we were to go over there.

Mr. BLANTON. I know that you gentlemen in the majority do not like to admit that you can not keep a quorum here on even private claim day. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] endeavored to eliminate all of the intended facetiousness out of my joke a while ago by claiming that it was imagination on my part or on the part of the gentleman from Wyoming. Why, the gentleman from Wyoming has not any imagination to speak of. He is one of these serious, matter-of-fact statesmen, if you please, and he was the author of that joke. I was merely repeating what he told me. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is really with me on this question, as is the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and my other colleagues ought to be with me. If there are private claims which ought not to be passed, we ought to have a sufficient number of the membership of the House present who are not interested in them to keep them from passing.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] used to be one of the most careful watchers of these claims that I ever heard of. Why, I used to read his objections to these claims in the RECORD long before I ever thought of Congress.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I am with the gentleman also.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure the gentleman is, because the distinguished chairman of this committee in this Congress has kept down bill after bill from being reported in his committee against which during the last—Sixty-fifth—Congress I filed minority reports. I admire him and commend him for it. He has kept them down. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] assumes jurisdiction of certain bills, as if only small bills ought to come before this committee. The distinguished chairman of the Claims Committee remembers that in the Sixty-fifth Congress we had one bill which totaled $101,000,000 before our committee, against which bill I filed a minority report, and he has kept it from being reported so far, and I commend him for it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read as follows:

A bill for the relief of the King Coal Co., of San Francisco, Calif.

On motion of Mr. ELSTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOSE RAMON CORDOVA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1034) for the relief of Jose Ramon Cordova.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in this bill and the succeeding bill it is asked that certain money be appropriated from the Treasury of the United States for the payment, in the first bill, to Jose Ramon Cordova, and in the second bill I believe to the widow of the gentleman named Akin for certain damages inflicted by members of the Piute Tribe of Indians. What I would like to have information about is whether there is not a liability on the part of this Piute Tribe of Indians and no liability on the part of the United States.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, my understanding from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is that this Piute Band, as they are called, is a renegade band of Indians, that they have no funds and no responsibility, and that there is no way of collecting any money from them.

Mr. GARD. There is no such report as that. I notice that there are two affidavits here on pages 2 and 3 of the report. One is the affidavit of Cordova, in which he prays judgment and damages in the sum of $5,000 and attorney fees in the sum of $1,000 against the United States and against the Southern Ute Indians and the Piute Indians, and in it he appoints one Cofield, of Cortez, Colo., as his attorney to prosecute the claim. The same thing appears in the affidavit of Cordova, on page 3 of the report, appointing Cofield as his true and lawful attorney to appear for him and in his name. Now, I think that these men should be——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I would like to make a brief statement concerning this matter.

Mr. GARD. I would be glad to permit a statement. What I want to know about is that we should have some information from the Department of the Interior regarding these Piute Indians, because I can not see why if a band of Indians, or a member or members of a band of Indians, to whom the Government is continuing to give money, kill a white man, a man called in a posse for the purpose of arresting an Indian murderer, why if there be any liability the liability should not be from those persons and not from the General Government?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the beginning of this matter was back in 1914, when a Mexican was believed to have been murdered by one of a small band of renegade Indians, and in February of 1915 there was a complaint made and warrant issued and put in the hands of the United States marshal of the State of Utah to go out and arrest an Indian by the name of Tse-ne-gat, nicknamed Hatch, for this murder. The Indian was sent word to come in, but instead of that he and others went out in the hills, hid in the rocks, and refused to be arrested. The United States marshal went down into that country in southeastern Utah to arrest the Indian. The marshal had this warrant and he was properly empowered, as the Federal officials say in their report, to make the arrest. He appointed a number of men as a posse for the purpose of assisting him in making this arrest. The Indians resisted arrest and in this attempt to arrest the Indian there was a running-fire fight, lasting some two or three hours, and a great many shots fired, and a man by the name of Joseph C. Akin was killed and another man by the name of Jose Ramon Cordova was shot through the left arm and through the lungs, through the body, and it came out on the other side. The statement of the physician and officials is as follows:

CERTIFICATE.

STATE OF COLORADO,
County of Montezuma, ss:

In re claim of Jose Ramon Cordova:

This is to certify that I am a regular practicing physician and surgeon and was in the month of February, 1915, such practicing physician and surgeon; that I am a graduate of the Chicago College of Medicine and Surgery.

That I attended professionally one Joseph Ramon Cordova at Bluff, Utah, who was wounded in the Indian uprising and fusillade at that place on or about February 21, 1915; that he was then suffering from a bullet wound of a 30–30 caliber shot, passing through his left arm, severing the musculospiral nerve, causing paralysis of the arm. It then penetrated the left thoracic cavity, piercing the lung, passing into the right pleural cavity and out on the posterior border of the right axilla. This was a very serious wound and only prompt and skilled service could have saved his life, as a marked degree of infection set in and he was in a serious condition for a long time. The paralysis is still present and it is a doubt in my mind if he ever will have the proper use of his arm and hand.

In re claim of Jose Ramon Cordova for damages on account of injuries inflicted by Piute Indians:

Aquila Nebeker, being first duly sworn, on his oath deposes and says that he is United States marshal for the State and district of Utah, and was such United States marshal and officer of the United States at the time of the Piute Indian uprising in the State of Utah on or about February, 1915. That as such officer he deputized J. N. Gingles, of Cortez, Colo., to take command of a posse to capture the renegade Piutes, among which were Tse-ne-gat, Polk, and Posey and others of said band. That among others duly and regularly appointed in said posse was one Jose Ramon Cordova. That on or about February 21, 1915, there was an encounter between said posse men under command of said J. N. Gingles and the said renegade Piute Indians, in which said Jose Ramon Cordova was shot by said renegade Piute Indians, or some one of them, and severely wounded, the ball passing through his, said Jose Ramon Cordova's, right shoulder and the upper part of his lungs and out under his left arm, inflicting a severe and dangerous wound upon his person, on account of which wounding and shooting as stated his life was despaired of, and from the effects of which wounding affiant believes that said Jose Ramon Cordova will never fully recover. That said gunshot wound was received by said Jose Ramon Cordova while in the line of duty, acting under authority and by order of the United States.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 22, 1917.

Hon. E. W. POU,
Chairman Committee on Claims, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In reply to your communication of the 6th instant, inclosing, for report thereon, copy of H. R. 18809, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, "A bill for the relief of Jose Ramon Cordova," proposing an appropriation of $5,000 to Jose Ramon Cordova for injuries received while serving as deputy marshal at Bluff City, Utah, I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of a report of the Auditor for the State and Other Departments of the 10th instant, stating that said Cordova was employed from February 17 to March 9, 1915, and that the account of Aquila Nebeker, United States marshal, district of Utah, for the quarter ended June 30, 1915, shows that Jose Ramon Cordova was employed as one of a number of posse men engaged in assisting to arrest an Indian named Tse-ne-gat, alias Everett Hatch, indicted for murder by a Federal grand jury in the district of Colorado.

The auditor calls attention to House Report No. 137, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, on H. R. 5729, for the relief of Dr. E. E. Johnson, in which it is stated that Jose Ramon Cordova was seriously wounded February 21, 1915, while in the discharge of his duty and was under the constant care of Dr. Johnson for 26 days thereafter.

It is suggested that the Department of Justice may have information relating to the case.

Very truly, yours, W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

EXHIBIT F.

OFFICE AUDITOR FOR THE STATE AND OTHER DEPARTMENTS,
January 10, 1917.

HONORABLE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants.

SIR: In reference to House bill No. 18809, for the relief of Jose Ramon Cordova, of Cortez, Colo., in the sum of $5,000, I have the honor to submit the following report:

It appears from the account of Aquila Nebeker, United States marshal, district of Utah, for the quarter ended June 30, 1915, that Jose Ramon Cordova was employed by the said marshal under proper authority as one of a number of posse men engaged in assisting to arrest, near Bluff, Utah, an Indian named Tse-ne-gat, alias Everett Hatch, indicted for murder by a Federal grand jury in the district of Colorado.

The said Cordova was employed from February 17 to March 9, 1915, inclusive, and was paid the sum of $105, at $5 per day, for his services for that period, and his actual expenses in addition, which sums were paid by Marshal Nebeker.

It further appears from the report (H. Rept. 137, 64th Cong., 1st sess.) on the bill (Private, No. 94, 64th Cong., H. R. 5729) for the relief of Dr. E. E. Johnson, that the said Cordova was seriously wounded on February 21, 1915, while in the discharge of his duty and was under the constant care of Dr. Johnson for 26 days thereafter.

The papers are herewith returned.

Respectfully, E. D. HEARNE, Auditor.

Cordova was at the point of death for some 26 days, under the care of a physician, and he never will be able to do any hard work any more. His arm was paralyzed a year after, and I understand he is in that condition yet. He has a wife and four little children. It was a very tragic matter. The War Department sent out one of the generals of the Army from Washington—Gen. Scott, I believe it was—to suppress these Utes and bring them in, and there was a large amount of expense and excitement connected with it. The people in that country evidently supposed that a claim of this kind would have to be presented to the Court of Claims, possibly, and the lawyer would have to come to Washington and present the matter, and that there was a great deal of formality about it. They afterwards found that the Interior Department and the Bureau of Indian Affairs said there was no way a claim of that kind could be put upon the Indians; that it must be presented to Congress and that was their only relief, and for that reason, while this attorney never had anything to do with the matter here, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio I am perfectly willing, and the gentleman from Utah, who knows all about these facts, has an amendment prepared that no part of this money shall be paid to any attorney at all. I might say further that they asked for $5,000 in this case, and in the next case also, for the widow of the man killed, but the committee has cut it down from $5,000 to $3 a day for one year, or $1,095. I do not know why they cut it down to $3 a day, because the United States auditor and the Treasurer in their reports, page 4, say that these deputy marshals were receiving $5 a day. Strictly speaking, under the rule of the House, we have for years and years when there was a death or an accident of this kind existing in the employment of Government service, when deputy marshals were duly empowered, duly appointed, when a death or accident occurred allowed a salary of one year. However, they have cut that down to $3, and made the amount $1,095.

I may say this bill was reported in the last Congress, and, as I recall it now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asked for further information. After his suggestion I got the report of the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Treasury, and the auditor, all of them, and added it to the report, and, as I understand it—at least, he told me to-day—it satisfied him, and I assumed that that would be perfectly satisfactory to the House, as the Claims Committee had reported out this sum twice. I do feel that they ought to be allowed $5,000, but I have not seriously objected to it, because it is only $1,095 for a widow, Mrs. Akin, that was left penniless, and with one little girl three or four years old, and this man Cordova is paralyzed and very seriously injured for life, and has a wife and four young children, and to give them only $1,095 it seems to me is a very small amount. I feel it is not right for the sum to be cut from $5,000 in both cases to $1,095. But that is the amount the committee reported, and that is the amount they reported the last time, and I certainly hope that inasmuch as this matter has been pending here a long time, and that the widow and this man have been without recognition for so long, the bill ought to meet with the approval of the House at this time. I certainly hope that neither the gentleman from Ohio nor any other gentleman will object to the consideration of this measure. I have tried to pass this bill for several years, and it is a very small amount for the loss which they have sustained in loyally rendering an enforced service to the Government of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, there being no information furnished in the very meager report as to why this particular amount, $1,095, as the gentleman from Colorado says, could not be assessed against the tribe of Indians, or at least taken up by some apportionment by the Government, because they were interested in the depredations, and it is they who injured this man, I am constrained to object.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman withhold the objection for a moment?

Mr. GARD. I will if I am guaranteed any amendment that will protect that.

Mr. WELLING. I can assure the gentleman this is a small band of Indians that has no tribal funds at all. There are tribal funds belonging to the Ute and Uncompahgre Bands in eastern Utah, but these Indians are 300 miles from those people. They are a segregated band of renegade Indians that never have in the past subjected themselves to the provisions of the Government and gone onto a reservation.

Mr. GARD. I do not question the gentleman's statement at all.

Mr. WELLING. They have absolutely no tribal funds.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman is well informed about Indian affairs——

Mr. WELLING. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in this connection.

Mr. GARD. Certainly.

Mr. WELLING. How in the world could he hold a tribe responsible for a murder committed by a member of the tribe, even if they had funds. The gentleman would not want the members of a white community to be held responsible for a murder committed by a white man simply because he lived in that community?

Mr. GARD. That is what you are doing. You are making the Government of the United States responsible. When this matter is presented as a claim of $5,000 against the United States and against the Southern Ute Indians, what I want to know is why the claim can not be paid by the Southern Ute Indians?

Mr. WELLING. The gentleman is basing his information on data prepared by an attorney in this case. The attorney brings in the Government of the United States and these particular Ute Indians. You might bring in a hundred other people, but that does not affect the validity of the claim at all.

As a matter of fact, the United States marshal went out and told them to get the outlaws, three or four men who had been creating the entire disturbance, and had fortified themselves, and these deputy marshals went after the renegade Indians and were killed in the discharge of their duty just as much——

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WELLING. Yes.

Mr. BEE. In view of the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, if this Congress does not allow to these people the claim that the committee has recommended, is there any tribunal upon the face of the earth from which these people will ever get any relief?

Mr. WELLING. There is none.

Mr. BEE. Then why should not the Congress give that relief when there is no one else that can possibly give it?

Mr. GARD. I have no objection to Congress giving relief. I know that Congress is passing upon all these private claims. What I want is to have some information from the Secretary of the Interior regarding these Southern Ute Indians and their responsibility and their tribal responsibility, if any. For that reason I object.

Mr. WELLING. They can have no tribal responsibility.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, if we pass any more bills to-day it will take all day to-morrow to read the Journal. How much longer does the gentleman propose to sit?

On motion of Mr. EVANS of Montana, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

V. E. SCHERMERHORN, E. C. CALEY, G. W. CAMPBELL, AND PHILIP HUDSPETH.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1330) for the relief of V. E. Schermerhorn, E. C. Caley, G. W. Campbell, and Philip Hudspeth.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. I object. If the gentleman from Kansas desires to make a statement, I will reserve my objection.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this is a claim for the destruction of farm property and an orchard by a fire caused by soldiers at Fort Riley, the farmers living near the reservation of the fort. The principal claim is for about 12½ acres of orchard, on which there were 637 trees actually destroyed, the trees being about 8 to 10 years old. A fair estimate of their value was $10 a tree. The officers themselves made an investigation and reported the damage to be about $4,200. Then they counted the trees after the farmer had dug them up, and found 625 trees, which they found to be worth about $2,700. The bill has been pending for several years. The farmer went in debt to buy his farm, and it was a very severe loss to him, as the orchard was expected to help meet the payments. He has waited all these years for his money. The committee have now recommended the $2,700, being the last amount reported, and, rather than wait any longer, he has decided to accept that amount. I think the small amount that has been allowed him ought to be paid.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, is he still living there on the same farm?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. He is still living there on the same farm.

Mr. WALSH. What did these other farmers lose?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Schermerhorn is the man who lost the largest amount. The other farmers did not lose so much. There is no dispute about the amount they lost. The fire occurred in 1908.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Schermerhorn is the man who lost the orchard?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. He lost over 12 acres of bearing orchard.

Mr. WALSH. Two hundred and twenty-five dollars an acre, and 28 bushels of apples at 40 cents. Is he willing to accept this amount as his loss?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. He is willing to accept that, it being what the Senate reported.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, this amount was very much larger when it was reported in former Congresses. I doubt the propriety of our passing claims for injuries such as this, the result of a fire getting away from soldiers, but it is possible that if this goes over for another session or two we can still further cut down this amount. I see it is gradually shrinking as the result of continued consideration by the committee.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Let me say to my colleague that the actual loss was over 600 bearing apple trees on 12 acres of ground, and his damage was undoubtedly $6,000 or $7,000. He put in a bill for just exactly what the agricultural college told him that the trees were worth. Then they submitted it to the officers, who reported $4,243 as the amount of the damage. Then reported again at $2,767. The Senate has finally passed it at $2,767. As he has waited all these years he is willing to take that rather than wait any longer, and it does not seem to me it is fair to keep him waiting longer. I hope my colleague will not object.

Mr. WALSH. I regret that I do not think we ought to pay this sort of a claim. So I will object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CALDER. I present resolutions adopted by citizens of Oswego, N. Y., at a mass meeting, held March 17, 1920, at St. Johns Hall, urging the recognition of the republic of Ireland. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEETING OF THE CITIZENS OF OSWEGO, N. Y., ON MARCH 17, 1920, AT ST. JOHNS HALL.

"Whereas under a decree of the British Government and at a time chosen by the British prime minister general elections were held in every one of the election districts throughout the republic of Ireland by ballot, on the basis of adult suffrage, in the month of December, 1918, such election being conducted under conditions which were conceived to operate in securing an unfavorable result to the republic and in favor of Great Britain; and

"Whereas under the most unfavorable circumstances which could possibly be arranged by the said election of December, 1918, out of a total of 101 representatives 72 stood unequivocally for an independent Irish republic and 6 others were self-determinationists, or a majority of 3½ to 1 against union with Great Britain; and

"Whereas the results of the said election of December, 1918, conclusively showed that of the 32 counties in Ireland in no one county was an entirely unionists representation elected and in only 4 did the unionists poll even a majority, but that the republicans polled a majority in 27 counties and secured the entire representation in 24 counties, all of the foregoing indicating unmistakably the will of the Irish people; and

"Whereas after four years of the most terrible conflict known since creation the right of self-determination of small nations has been conceded and the hand of tyranny has been stayed, God willing, for all time, and this God-given right of self-determination having been demanded by the Irish people through the ballot in the election of December, 1918, the means adopted by Great Britain to justify her tyranny before the civilized world: Now be it

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting of the people of the city of Oswego, N. Y., here assembled that the Government of the United States, through its duly credited authorities, should officially recognize the republic of Ireland and that its people are and of right should be free and independent; and be it further

"Resolved, That we here assembled indorse and unqualifiedly request that the Mason bill, so called, now before the House of Representatives of the United States, be passed and become a law; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to Hon. Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, and to each Member of the Senate and the House of Representatives."

All soldiers, sailors, or marines dying in the service of the United States, or dying in a destitute condition after having been honorably discharged from the service, or who served, or hereafter shall have served, during any war in which the United States has been, or may hereafter be, engaged, and, with the consent of the Secretary of War, any citizen of the United States who served in the Army or Navy of any government at war with Germany or Austria during the World War and who died while in such service or after honorable discharge therefrom, may be buried in any national cemetery free of cost. The production of the honorable discharge of a deceased man in the former case, and a duly executed permit of the Secretary of War in the latter case, shall be sufficient authority for the superintendent of any cemetery to permit the interment. Army nurses honorably discharged from their service as such may be buried in any national cemetery, and, if in a destitute condition, free of cost. The Secretary of War is authorized to issue certificates to those Army nurses entitled to such burial."

Y., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR BRANDEGEE.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered recently by the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] at New Haven, Conn., before the Republican State convention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request is granted.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS DELIVERED AT NEW HAVEN, CONN., BEFORE THE REPUBLICAN STATE CONVENTION, MARCH 24, 1920.

Gentlemen of the convention, it is a great pleasure to me as one of the representatives of the grand old State of Connecticut in the United States Senate to meet with you in conference upon this highly important occasion. I appreciate deeply the compliment implied and the honor conferred by this body, representative of the vast interests and welfare of over a million and a quarter of the best people in America, in your designation of me as your presiding officer. The Republican conventions of 1908, 1914, and 1916 called me to the same position. To-night we take the first step in that process of organization, deliberation, and selection which I am firmly convinced will result in placing at the head of this Nation, for the critical period of the next four years, a Republican President and a Congress of the same political faith to cooperate with him.

In the summer of 1914 the World War broke upon an unsuspecting world with a suddenness and destructive effect equaled only by the cyclonic forces of nature itself. Since that time, and for a period of six years, civilization has rocked upon its foundations, like the earth when rent and upheaved by a great seismic convulsion. The minds, the emotions, and the institutions of great peoples everywhere, over the entire world, have been torn from their accustomed channels and habits and have been diverted into new courses and have been of necessity applied under the spur of insistent emergency to the preservation of civilization. All the people of the world have lived under the stress of a tremendous strain and all the conditions of existence have been threatening and uncertain. In the whole history of recorded time the world has never been so disturbed nor has its population suffered so severe a shock as during the few years which we have just survived. Great Governments have crashed to their destruction; whole peoples and races have become free; dynastic rulers have been overthrown; the boundaries of empires have been changed; armies and navies have been created and dispersed; millions of lives and of property have been destroyed; financial inflation, debt, and burdensome taxes have come upon us; unrest, dissatisfaction, and high prices prevail; drastic and questionable laws have been enacted, justified, if at all, only under the so-called war power. Espionage acts, statutes limiting commerce with other nations and their nationals, and authorizing the control by the Central Government of the transportation and sale of our domestic products, have been passed. Rigid censorship of the press, more drastic regulation of the right of speech and assembly, have been prescribed. In a word, the ordinary course of life of peoples and of nations has been transformed from that which obtains in time of peace to that which prevails in time of war, as the status of nations has changed from peace to war and back again from war to peace. Our statutes passed to aid the war activities of our Nation are still in existence. Some of them by their terms are to remain in operation until six months after the termination of the war shall have been proclaimed by the President. They are irritating, burdensome, oppressive, and unnecessary, and should be repealed at the earliest possible moment. Every effort should be used to free our people from war-time restrictions and reestablish the conditions of peace to which we were accustomed. It is not to be expected that the means of production, transportation, and marketing of products can be changed forthwith, and successfully changed, without great inconvenience and disturbance, but the attempt to reestablish the peaceful processes which were interrupted by the war should be, at least, begun immediately and steadily continued.

The experiences through which the world has passed have necessarily been productive of great mental apprehension and unrest. The nervous system of the world has been impaired and in many respects seriously and, perhaps, permanently damaged. The human system can not endure war, pestilence, and famine without affecting the entire constitution. The lightning changes of war, the extreme tension, the sudden readjusment of the emotions from hope to hope deferred and then to despair, the rebound to the attainment of the most cherished aspirations, the alternating currents of fear, pity, and revenge, necessarily produce a certain lack of mental balance, in many cases approaching to hysteria. The tremendous and vital processes of reconstruction must operate upon and be operated by human beings thus constituted. The interplay of the forces, physical and spiritual, which have been thus generated produces an infinitely complicated environment. The world has never had greater need of patience, poise, and balance than it requires to-day. Under such conditions it is inevitable that a flood of fanciful remedies should be advocated. The fundamentals of government and of institutions and of beliefs have been seriously disturbed. Many ships of state have dragged their anchors. New crews have been enlisted and new pilots and captains are navigating the craft. The political as well as the geographical seas of the world have been sown with mines, and they are charged with high explosives. We must for a long time steer cautiously until we have swept away the mines and made of the greenhorns before the mast, as well as in the captain's quarters, able seamen and skilled mariners.

"What is needed now is composure. The world has had enough of artificial stimulants, and what it needs now is the anodyne of peaceful pursuits and liberty regulated by law. Lawlessness is contagious. The mob is the symbol, the result, as well as the cause, of anarchy. Stability is the condition precedent of all readjustment and of all progress. It is better not to move at all unless one knows whither he is bound. If one is not sure of his direction, he is more likely than not to wander around in circles. Fundamentally there is nothing the matter with this Government or its institutions. We are blessed in the possession of a continent flanked by the two great oceans of the world. Its resources are inexhaustible. If properly developed they are capable of supporting a population tenfold that which now inhabits it. Every citizen is free and is the equal of every other citizen. Every one of them is protected by the guaranties of a Constitution which has always been and is now the wonder and admiration of the world. We are the richest, the most powerful, the best educated, the most tolerant, the most philanthropic, and the ablest people in the world. Surely we should be proud of these blessings. We should venerate the fathers who secured them and transmitted them to us. We should respect their experience, their advice, and their teachings. Their wisdom and foresight should be an inspiration to us and should implant in us a firm purpose to preserve and transmit, unimpaired, our priceless heritage.

The framers of our Constitution established a representative form of government as well as a dual form of government. Our revolution against Great Britain, from the success of which we owe our existence as a nation, was a protest and a revolt against autocracy and arbitrary power. Our ancestors refused to assent to the doctrine of one-man power. They declined to recognize any overlord or king. The only sovereign to which they would pledge allegiance was the people. They distributed the powers of government among three great departments, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial, and by a system of checks and balances, and requirements for coordination, they made it impossible for one department to become supreme to the exclusion of the others. They intended to form an effective and a strong government, and they intended to make forever impossible a dictator or an autocrat. They limited the powers of the Federal Government to such as were specifically granted and necessarily implied from those granted.

As soon as the Union was formed they amended the Constitution by adopting the first 10 amendments known as the Bill of Rights, and provided that "the enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people," and also that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." These two amendments to the Constitution, being articles 9 and 10, were proposed to the legislatures of the several States by the very first Congress on the 25th of September, 1789, and were duly ratified by the necessary number of States, thus becoming a part of the fundamental law itself. They demonstrate how jealous the founders of our Government were of the powers of the States and of the people, and how careful they were to provide for what have since come to be known as the "reserved rights of the States." Many good but not well-informed people seem to think that the doctrine of "State rights" was an error closely related to secession and was extirpated when the War of the Rebellion in 1861 was concluded. The only State right, so called, which was repudiated by that war was the alleged right of secession from the Union. No well-informed person, whether Republican, Democrat, or Whig, has ever claimed that the rights of the States as defined in the Constitution and as reserved in the tenth amendment thereto were not in as full and complete existence to-day as they were when the Government was founded. The several States should guard these reserved rights with the greatest vigilance.

It is inevitable that with the increase in the population, wealth, and importance of the country the Federal Government will increase in power, and there is a constant temptation on the part of the Central Government to encroach upon the jurisdiction and powers of the several States. As our population increases and more and more divides itself into special industries and activities of all kinds, those who have special interests inevitably organize along the lines of their particular interests, and when they desire legislation to promote those interests, instead of attempting to procure it by uniformity of legislation in the 48 States, there is a strong disposition to organize nationally and demand such legislation from Congress. Thus, a continual conflict is produced between the jurisdiction of Congress and the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the States. Any object which is praiseworthy in itself is sought to be brought to the consideration of Congress in order that means for its attainment may be extended over the entire Nation. A conspicuous example of this kind was afforded in the child-labor law, by which an attempt was made to prohibit the transportation from one State to another of any article in the production of which the labor of any child under a certain age, or who had worked more than a certain number of hours, had entered. This legislation was claimed to be justifiable under the commerce clause of the Constitution, which conferred upon Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several States. If this legislation could have been sustained Congress could have, with equal legality, passed a law prohibiting the transportation of commodities from one State to another into which negro labor had entered as a factor or upon which any member of a labor union had worked. This law was declared to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States. Congress recently submitted to the several States a proposed constitutional amendment prohibiting the States from discriminating between its citizens in relation to the elective franchise on account of sex, which has already been ratified by the legislatures of nearly a sufficient number of States to make it a part of the United States Constitution, although both of the great political parties had in the platforms of their last national conventions favored the principle of woman suffrage, but declared it to be a matter falling more properly within the jurisdiction of the States than a subject for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

I was unable to support this amendment because I considered it wiser public policy for the several States to prescribe the qualifications of their own electors. An amendment to the Constitution of the United States has recently been adopted which prohibits the manufacture, transportation, or sale of intoxicating liquors within the jurisdiction of the United States. I was unable to support this amendment because I was of the opinion that it was an infringement upon the reserved rights of the States, an attempt to impair the police power of the States, and a violation of the principle of home rule. If this amendment to the Constitution is sustained by the Supreme Court, I am unable to perceive any limit beyond which the invasion of the rights of the States may not proceed. My opinions upon these questions involving the demarcation of the line between the rights of the States and the powers of the Central Government are based solely upon the legal aspects of the case and are formed entirely irrespective of the merits of the proposals involved. Several suits are now pending in the Supreme Court which it is hoped will furnish a sure guide as to the extent to which the Constitution is susceptible of amendment. If there is no limit in the processes provided for amending the Constitution, that great charter of fundamental law, designed to describe and apportion the powers of our form of Government, may before long be filled with statutes regulating the lives of the people. Former Senator Elihu Root, addressing the Senate once, referred to the danger in the following impressive language:

"In this highly developed interdependent condition day by day we grow to rely more and more on the Government that is regulating all the agencies that are necessary to our lives. What government shall perform that function? If the State government is abandoned, if we recognize the fact that we can not have honest legislatures, sir, the tide that now sets toward the Federal Government will swell in volume and in power. Here is a power that can answer the demands of life.

"Let me tell the gentlemen who are solicitous for the preservation of the sovereignty of their States that there is but one way in which they can preserve that sovereignty, and that is by repudiating absolutely and forever the fundamental doctrine upon which this resolution proceeds. Let them go home to their States when this session ends and invoke the patriotism of their people to make the government of their States worthy of the great duties that rest upon them and competent to preserve the autonomy of their States against that incursion of Federal power which is being continually urged, urged by those who fail to find satisfaction from the governments of the States.

"In my humble judgment, sir, the most vital thing to be done in the United States to-day is to strengthen the legislatures of the States. I fear the breaking down of the Government of the United States by the accumulation of demands upon it, through the gradual weakening of the State governments, through the failure of the State governments to keep pace with the continually increasing demands of our social and business life.

"We have come very near the limit, sir, of what we can competently do, very near the limit of what we can do as well as it ought to be done. Our executive officers are overburdened. The business of this Congress is conducted with less and less knowledge on the part of the Members of the body in general as to what committees have been doing. We are forced session by session to more complete reliance upon the reports of the committees, with less and less consideration from the Members of Congress at large. Our judicial force is being overburdened and our calendars clogged, and we are looking about for ways to relieve this court and that from too heavy a burden and to prevent the law's delays.

"Let us continue upon the theory that State governments are corrupt and incompetent. The time will come when the Government of the United States will be driven to the exercise of more arbitrary and unconsidered power, will be driven to greater concentration, will be driven to extend its functions into the internal affairs of the States; and then, sooner or later, the people of the country will reject a Government that has subjected their personal and intimate neighborhood affairs to the control of a central power in Washington, and then in the place of competent States governing their own affairs we shall go through the cycle of concentration of power at the center while the States dwindle into insignificance, and ultimately the breaking up of the great Republic upon new lines of separation.

"* * * We have gone far, far away from the days of the old New England town meetings. I doubt if some of the Senators coming from the States of small population realize how far we have gone in the great industrial communities of the East and the Middle West from that condition in which direct democratic government is possible.

"The true remedy for the evils that we see is not to abandon our duty, but to perform it.

The Constitution of the United States provides for its own amendment by a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress when approved by the legislatures of three-quarters of the States. The people have no voice whatever in this process. No State constitution can be amended without the proposed amendment being submitted for the approval of the electors of the State. The Constitution of the United States, however, can be amended by the vote of the two legislative bodies referred to above without any reference to the people whatever. This condition, which may have been tolerable so long as amendments to the Federal Constitution were confined to subjects germane thereto, becomes unbearable and undemocratic if the amendment process is to be invoked for the purpose of embedding in the Federal Constitution matters relating to the food, drink, and intimate concerns of the people in their daily vocations. With a view of providing a remedy for the correction of this abuse I introduced and have secured a favorable report upon Senate joint resolution 41 by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate. This resolution proposes to amend article 5 of the Constitution so that in the future Congress may propose amendments to be ratified by the electors in three-quarters of the States instead of by the legislatures as now provided. Under the present provision of the Constitution for its amendment, the legislatures of the States may be called upon to ratify amendments which have never been discussed by the people and upon which they have rendered no expression of their opinion. Organizations interested in securing an amendment to the Constitution, it may easily be imagined, could, if properly financed by wealthy people, interested in what they consider to be a worthy cause, by skillful advertising and the employment of influential agents, artificially create the semblance of a wide demand for the ratification of some amendment, when, if the matter was submitted to the people, so that the other side of the question could be heard and the whole matter properly discussed and voted upon, the verdict of the people might be overwhelmingly against the proposal.

In my addresses to the Republican conventions of 1914 and 1916 I reviewed, in so far as it could be done in the brief time which could be devoted to the task, the character and defects of the present Democratic administration. It is my sad duty to announce that it has neither improved its character nor remedied its shortcomings. It has, on the other hand, gone from bad to worse. No President of the United States has ever been so shielded from just criticism by events as has the President of the United States. Within a few months after the ruinous tariff law which his party enacted had gone into operation the country was saved from the complete disaster which inevitably impended by the outbreak of the Great War.

During the entire period of the war inefficiency, incompetency, and extravagance of the grossest kind were overlooked by an indulgent and patriotic people on the theory that such criticism might afford aid or comfort to the enemy. The President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of a nation engaged in war for the salvation of civilization, assumed and exercised what was nearly equivalent to a dictatorship. In the minds and hearts of a patriotic and united people his person and his words and deeds were well-nigh sacrosanct. Congress, in its recognition of a state of war, had pledged the entire resources of the country to bring the war to a successful conclusion. Whatever was demanded by the Executive or the heads of his departments was granted in its entirety almost without question. Men and money and credit were furnished without stint. A veritable orgy of expenditure ensued, based upon and excused by the fact that we had entered the war almost entirely unprepared. The condition of unpreparedness was largely the fault of the President. For three years the Allies had conducted the war while the President was stating that we were too proud to fight; that the causes of the war were of no concern to us; that he was unable to discern any difference between the purposes of the two sets of belligerents; that it was our duty to be neutral even in thought; that there must be peace without victory; and that America must lead her own life and keep clear of European entanglements. In 1916, after this record, he was reelected on the ground that he had succeeded in keeping us out of the war, and within a few weeks after his inauguration he appeared before Congress and recommended that we should get into the war. When Members of Congress attempted to make any preparation, the President appeared before us and stated that we were getting nervous and excited. Of course, under this kind of leadership, there was and there could be no effective preparation. The result was that when the President, finally compelled by the irresistible sweep of aroused public opinion, reversed his attitude, it took $5 to accomplish what $1 would adequately have accomplished if spent under peace conditions. It can never be estimated what the misconception of the situation by the President cost the country in blood and lives and treasure. When the tide of battle had finally turned and the allied armies could have marched to Berlin, and made their victory complete, the President promulgated his 14 points, which resulted in an armistice, and the return of the army of the enemy, with banners flying and bands playing, in safety to his own country. The 14 points were thereupon relegated into innocuous desuetude.

In my address to the convention of 1914 and again in 1916, I referred to the course of the administration in its handling of the Mexican problem as one not deserving the designation of a "policy," and declared that it had been "an impotent and imbecile drift," a "mischievous meddling," and except for that "a do-nothing policy." This futile and disgraceful policy of "watchful waiting" has now extended over a period of six years and conditions in Mexico are worse than ever. American consuls, American soldiers in their uniforms, American aviators, and American travelers are daily kidnapped by bandits and held for ransom. Some are murdered; others are imprisoned; and others are never heard of. After each outrage a note is sent demanding immediate disavowal and reparation. The usual excuse or defiance is made and the incident is closed. No more disgraceful chapter has ever disgraced the pages of our history. American business men engaged in legitimate business operations in Mexico are compelled to pay stated sums to various bandit chiefs for protection.

In many instances the pay rolls due to workers in the mines and oil fields are intercepted by the bandits and are divided with the Carranza soldiers, who make little pretense of affording protection. The files of the State Department are filled with evidence of crimes and outrages of every known variety perpetrated by Mexicans against the persons and property of Americans, but no effective protection is afforded and no punishment is inflicted upon either the perpetrators of the crime or the Mexican officials whose duty it is to protect the peaceable citizens of this country in their rights in Mexico. The situation is simply appaling, but the American people have apparently abandoned all hope of any relief as long as the present administration is in power.

I have called attention to the inefficiency of the various departments of the Government. It is almost unnecessary to enter into the details of what the people already know from their daily reading of events. These departments have been expanded and their expense has increased almost in direct proportion to their inefficiency. Meetings of the Cabinet are few and far between. The Post Office Department perhaps comes as close to the people in their daily life as any one of the great departments. The utter demoralization of the service in this department would be a huge national joke if it were not a tragedy and a scandal. The State Department is a mere shell. It is said that there are more than a dozen duly accredited representatives of foreign governments who have been waiting in Washington for months but have never been able to secure reception by the President. There is almost a complete lack of communication or of coordination between the President and the Congress. Even the leaders of his own party are unable to see him except upon the rarest occasions and upon the most important matters of public business. For nearly six months last passed the President has been unable to perform the duties of his office, yet he apparently has no intention of resigning and allowing the Vice President, upon whom the Constitution devolves the duty in such a case, to perform it. It is apparent to anybody that the tremendously important affairs of this great country of a hundred and ten millions of people can not be properly conducted under such circumstances. When the Secretary of State attempted, during the illness of the President, to see that affairs were conducted by the heads of the departments as best they might be, he was reprimanded and rebuked by the President and dismissed from the service.

Shortly before the November elections in 1918 the President appealed to the country to elect a Congress Democratic in both branches. He stated that no Republican should be elected because, while that party had been loyal and patriotic during the war, it did not support his policies. He stated that unity of command in civil action was just as necessary as it was on the field of battle, and he appealed to the country to indorse his administration by giving him a Democratic Congress in order that he might be their unembarrassed spokesman abroad. The idea that a party comprising more than half of the electors of the country must be disfranchised and placed under disabilities so far as representation in Congress was concerned during the rest of the President's administration so utterly shocked and outraged the electorate that it hastened to the polls and returned a Congress Republican in both branches. One of the defects of our form of Government is that, although the country may have utterly lost confidence in the administration of a President and may have elected a Congress of opposing political faith as an expression of its lack of confidence, it can not get rid of the administration which has been thus repudiated before the expiration of its constitutional term of office. It can, to a certain extent by such an election, impose a check upon the Executive and control the purse strings of the Nation, but the Executive in whom the country has lost faith still has his appointees at the head of all the executive departments, making all appointments to high office of his own political party, continues to manage the foreign relations of the country to suit himself, through his ambassadors and his control of the State Department, is enabled to formulate in the first instance, at least, all foreign policies, and continues to be the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

This can hardly be considered other than a serious defect in our form of government, especially in time of emergencies, when immediate action is required. In other parliamentary governments the government is carried on by a ministry, headed by a prime minister. When the ministry proposes an important measure for which it can not command a majority in the legislative branch of the government or when a vote of lack of confidence in the ministry is passed by the legislative body the ministry falls. An appeal is made to the country, and if the elections go against the party in power a new ministry is formed, which is required to conform the policies of Government to the wishes of the people. This change can be brought about in a few weeks. As soon as the new legislative body is elected the mandate of the people can be put into immediate execution. In this country, inasmuch as only one-third of the Senate is elected at the congressional elections every two years, it frequently happens that, although the country may elect a President by a considerable popular majority, the Senate may remain in control of the opposite political party. Moreover, a House of Representatives chosen in November of one year does not take office in regular course until a year from the December following its election. While this system may have merit at times, it presents a question which calls for the most serious consideration as to whether means ought not to be taken by which the policies of government may be made to respond with less delay to the expressed wishes of the electors.

The people having declined to commission Mr. Wilson as their unembarrassed spokesman abroad, the President, nevertheless, decided to go abroad himself as the head of his own commission to negotiate the treaty of peace. He appeared before a joint session of Congress and informed that body that he regarded it as his imperative duty to go abroad in person upon this commission. He stated that he would keep us advised of all that he did. He denounced secret diplomacy and pledged himself to open covenants of peace openly arrived at. His sayings and doings while abroad at the peace conference, to such extent at least as they have become public, have taken place too recently to warrant a rehearsal in detail. The public knows in a vague way that the President made what was equivalent to a royal progress through Europe. He and his family and an entourage of between 1,200 and 1,500 people transported upon Government vessels spent six months in the capitals of Europe. Although what is called a 'procès-verbal,' meaning an official record of what was said and done at this conference with the rulers of Europe, was kept and is in possession of each of those who participated and was shown to the committee on foreign affairs of the French Parliament, it was denied to the American Senate, and the President cabled to M. Clemenceau, the French premier, that it must not be made public. The Senate has repeatedly adopted resolutions calling for information upon various subjects connected with the treaty of peace with Germany. Most of these requests have been denied.

"As soon as the conference had agreed upon the first draft, called a constitution for a League of Nations, the President returned to America. He invited the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives to meet him at the White House in conference upon this great document. He opened this conference by saying that, of course, he had no statement to make, but he thought perhaps some one might want to ask some questions. Many questions were thereupon asked. Discussion was had and the President was informed that in many respects the document was unsatisfactory and would have to be changed.

A few days after this the President made an address in New York City, in which he stated that he was again going abroad, and that when he returned the covenant would be found so interwoven and connected by so many bonds with the peace treaty with Germany that it would be impossible to separate the two documents. The next day he sailed for Paris. Inasmuch as the strictest censorship prevailed, it was difficult to inform the people and the representatives of other nations how the Senate, which was the equal partner with the President in the treaty-making power, viewed the great international contract which the President was in process of making as the other half of the treaty-making power. The Government was in possession of the trans-Atlantic cables. The Governments of Great Britain and France controlled the press of those countries. American censors were placed at the ends of the cables in France to see that nothing from this country entered France which would inform that country of the true state of feeling in this country. Similarly nothing was allowed to come from France or the peace conference from which the people in this country could ascertain what was transpiring in the peace conference. In this atmosphere of secrecy and mystery the covenant for a League of Nations was generated. The day before the President had left upon his second trip to the peace conference the Senate, in order to give warning to the representatives of foreign nations with whom the President was negotiating of the true state of feeling in the Senate, signed a paper which stated in substance that the draft of the covenant which the President had showed to Senators ought not to be accepted by the United States. This document, popularly known as the round robin, will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 4, 1919, page 4974. It was signed by more than one-third of the total membership of the Senate. The covenant is part 1 of the treaty of peace with Germany. Inasmuch as under the Constitution the President can make no treaty binding upon this country except with the approval of two-thirds of the Senators present, this round robin was fair notice in advance by more than the number of Senators necessary to defeat the treaty that the covenant would not be accepted in the form in which it then was. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing this warning was no doubt sent by the diplomatic representative of every European power to his home Government in this official diplomatic mail pouch, and there can be no question that every Government participating in the peace conference was fairly and duly warned thereby that the President did not represent the views of half the treaty-making power of the United States. It must be borne in mind, however, that these foreign Governments were dependent at the close of this exhausting war upon the United States for financial aid, for raw material, and for food, coal, clothing, and every kind of necessity. They knew also that the President had appointed himself as the head of the peace commission and would remain at the head of all the departments of the Government until the expiration of his term of office on March 3, 1921. When, therefore, in spite of this warning, the President informed them that he would not participate in the making of the treaty of peace with Germany unless they first agreed that the covenant for a League of Nations should be a part of the treaty, it can well be understood that they were compelled to yield. There was none other with whom they could negotiate. They doubtless thought that if they yielded to him they would have his support and good offices, and if he told them that if they did yield to him he would return to America and personally tour the country in the effort to arouse the people to force the Senate to agree with him, they probably thought it was worth while taking the chance.

At any rate, they took the chance, and it does not now lie in the mouth of any of them to plead ignorance of the terms of the Constitution of the United States or to claim that they thought that the President had the constitutional power by his mere word to bind the people to a treaty against the will of the Senate. The President was allowed to exercise his own best judgment and his own free will in negotiating the most important international document which was ever written. Nobody attempted to force him. Nobody presumed to dictate to him. Is it not the clear purpose of the Constitution that the Senate of the United States, which the fathers contemplated should be the equal partner of the President in making a treaty binding upon this Government, should express its own free, untrammeled judgment without coercion by the other branch of the treaty-making power? If the President is to be allowed to coerce the Senate, why should not the Senate try to coerce the President. When the sovereign States formed the Federal Government and provided that each State and its people should be represented in the Senate by two of its citizens who should be Senators of the United States and made the approval of that Senate necessary to the making of any treaty, did they not intend that that body of Senators should voice their real sentiments as to the foreign policy to be adopted by this country? Do the people of this country want the Senate to abandon its matured judgment, after due consideration, and to say that they approve of a treaty when they do not approve of it? Some people seem to think that the Senate should approve of what it disapproves on the ground that some day the treaty may be made into something which it is not now. The provisions of the treaty can only be changed by the unanimous vote of all the signatory powers. The covenant can only be amended by the unanimous vote of all the Governments which are members of the league and who have votes in the council, together with a majority of all the Governments which have representatives in the assembly of the League of Nations.

The basis of the covenant is force. The President, in his recent letter to Senator HITCHCOCK, stated that it erects a tribunal to which all must submit and that its decisions are to be secured by the moral and physical force of all the members of the league. With a full knowledge of what the European members of the league have done since the armistice was effected, do the people of America desire this country to bind itself to this league of force in the hope that some day the great military powers of Europe may by unanimous vote of the council agree to substitute for this covenant another covenant based upon justice and equity? If these powers can now wring from the United States the solemn pledge contained in article 10 of the covenant to protect, as against external aggression, the political independence and territorial integrity of their respective Governments and their vast domains in five continents, is anybody credulous enough to suppose that when their subject nations rise against them and seek to obtain their own independence, that these powers will release the United States from this obligation and will refer the questions in dispute to an international tribunal to decide these questions in accordance with an established code of international law based upon justice and eternal right? With full knowledge of the history of these powers in the past and with a consciousness of the failings and defects of human nature, do the people of the United States want to take this chance? It is said that we might enter this league, and then at the expiration of two years, if we did not like it, we might retire, provided meantime we had performed all our obligations under the covenant and all our international obligations.

The next two years, however, will be the critical time in the whole league. It will be the period in which the international obligations of all kinds will be assumed by the members of the league. Nobody can say what these obligations will be. The President and whoever he might appoint as our representative on the council of the league whose mind would go along with his would no doubt improve the time between now and March 4, 1921, in so inextricably interweaving us into all the interlocking obligations of the league, financial, commercial, diplomatic, and military, that it would be impossible for us to claim that we had performed all the obligations which we had contracted in order to make ourselves eligible for withdrawal.

The father of our country warned us to keep out of entangling alliances with Europe, and stated that they had a set of special interests with which we had no concern and ought not to become involved. President Wilson, the exponent of the new internationalism, insists upon thrusting us into these foreign entanglements. Do the people of this country desire that the Senate should abandon the policy of George Washington and adopt that of President Wilson? Do they desire to reverse the consistent and continued policy of every President from Washington to Wilson and of all the people of America since the foundation of our Government and to project our country into this vast international experiment? Does the great mass of the plain people of this country desire to contribute the man power and authorize the taxes which may be involved in this plunge into the unknown? If the people of Russia decide to march their unnumbered millions across the boundaries of East India, a member of the league, do the voters of America actually favor the conscripting of the youth of the country and the furnishing of the vast sums of money necessary to train, equip, and transport it to the other side of the world to make common cause under article 10 with the British Empire to help it preserve the territorial integrity of East India and enable it to hold the subject millions of that continent under its sway? Do the voters of America conceive that the fathers adopted the Constitution and formed this Government for any such purpose as that? Do our people feel under any obligation to make a contract which may involve such sacrifices? The President states that he is ready to make the supreme sacrifice. He says that he is willing to die for his covenant. Are you? Do you think there is any reason why you should? If you are not willing to carry out such a contract if called upon, do you want the Senate to make it for you?

Europe has been a battle field for a thousand years. It is divided into nations radically different from each other and from us in blood, in language, in civilization, in ideals, in ambitions, in inherited grievances, and in present aspirations. The States of the Balkan Peninsula alone present a problem which has puzzled and baffled the powers of Europe for hundreds of years. Russia, Poland, Germany, Austria, and all central and southern Europe are seething with difficulties and problems about which we as a people are in absolute ignorance. The population of this country, or its ancestors, all came from abroad. The melting pot has hardly begun to do its work. No people of Europe can have a dispute with any other nation unless our fellow citizens in this country who are related to the disputing nations abroad are immediately interested in the cause of their own blood relatives abroad. The people of every country of Europe are in this country in great numbers. If we enter this league our representative sitting abroad in the secret council of the league must cast his vote, possibly the deciding vote, in every dispute. Whenever he casts his vote he makes an enemy of the people against whom he decides. He creates that hostility not against himself but against our country.

The people of this country who are blood relatives of the people of the country against whom our representative has given the decision are interested at once. They protest to the President, to the Senate, and to their Representatives in Congress. They transfer their grievance to the polls. It forthwith becomes a political question in this country, and if the disputes of Europe continue in the future as they have in the past, our political life in this country will be as contentious as the politics of the Old World and the quarrel will be about a question in which this country as a whole may have very little interest. The affairs in this country of the subject races over all the surface of the globe will be in a continuous ferment by propaganda and influence of every kind to interest this people and this Government in active intervention in their behalf. In view of the cosmopolitan character of our population, do the level-headed voters of America want to embark this country upon such a career? In view of the rivalry of races in this country and their conflicting interests, of how much value would we be in a League of Nations? Is our Government itself so stable and are our people of such single mind and purposes as that 3,000 miles away from the troubles of the countries whose boundaries are contiguous and who are perfectly familiar with their own troubles, dangers, and aspirations, as that we can act as a healing poultice and an effective and safe adviser? The President has stated that there would be no use in our entering the league unless we can do it whole-heartedly and with enthusiasm. Yet now the President states that we must have a solemn referendum in a political campaign of partisan politics to decide whether we shall enter or not. It may be true that in a great democracy like this we ought not to enter this league except by the vote of the people, but if that vote should be close, would the half of the country which had been beaten in the election cordially participate in the decision of the bare majority that the whole country should be dragged into this foreign alliance? Can a sullen partner, dragged into a combination against his will, contribute an element for the peaceful and harmonious solution of other quarrels when he represents, at best, a house divided against itself? Will America be more effective for the maintenance of peace in the world, for the abolition of war, for the establishment of justice and equity and its high ideals by becoming a member of this polyglot international association than it could by remaining free and untrammeled in its might and majesty? Will it not have a greater moral influence for the right and justice and equity and fair dealing if it preserves its own independence and is free to announce its unbiased judgment in any contingency that may arise? Can it not through its Executive department and its diplomatic corps consult and advise with other nations in fully as disinterested a way and quite as effectively if it stays out of the league as it could if it was submerged in it? Should our course in a matter of such vast importance be determined by the wishes of other nations who may be looking after their own interests or should our choice be determined by our own best judgment? Should we judge this question upon its merits in the cool light of reason, history, and experience, or should we abandon our advantageous position and our unbroken policy of a century and a half under which we have grown and prospered and take this leap in the dark because other nations have been persuaded to do so? The nations who have joined this league are already announcing that it must be reformed and made over. Is it not more reasonable to suppose that it can be reformed to our satisfaction as the price of our entering it rather than that those who control it will reform it to suit a single member after his admission has been secured? Is it compatible with the self-respect, safety, and best interests of this great Nation to join a league in the voting power of which the British Empire is six times as powerful as we are? Would you employ a lawyer who would advise you to make a contract with a partner who had six votes in the concern to your one? Is such a proposition defensible? If any one of you were Senators, acting as a trustee for the best interests of a great State, and in a larger sense as a representative of the whole country, would you vote, under your oath of office and on your responsibility as a Senator, to bind your Nation to such a contract? I was utterly unable to do so.

The great task now in front of the country is to aid in the return to the paths of peace. Every effort should be made to stimulate our processes of production and commerce. We have an immense debt to pay. The most rigid economy in expenditures should be exercised. The Republican Party should be restored to power in the executive as well as in the legislative branch. The men who have rendered inefficient the present operations of the departments should be retired to private life. New blood should be infused in every department as the directing agency. It is impossible for those who have proved inefficient to conduct the necessary reforms. Appropriations of the vast sums of money needed for the public expenses should be made with a stricter regard for the sources of revenue. Modern business methods should be introduced into the departments. Coordination between the departments, with reference to appropriations, should be inaugurated. Raids upon the Federal Treasury, which have been conducted in the past in order to place upon the General Government the burdens which should be borne by the several States, should be brought to an end. An independent habit of conduct should be encouraged so that the growing tendency of people to demand care by the Government instead of caring for themselves could be checked. All unnecessary impediments upon legitimate business which have been inaugurated by the Government should be released, and business should, as far as possible, be allowed to take its natural course without governmental interference. Cooperation between capital and labor should be encouraged Tribunals for the adjustment of differences between workmen and employers should be erected, to the end that strict and impartial justice may be done to all parties and interests, including the public. Class legislation should be discouraged. It is impossible and it is un-American for a legislative body to pass just laws if they concern themselves about particular classes of people as against the whole body of the people. The public interest should be the supreme law. The great arteries of commerce should be maintained free from all obstruction. The whole people must be made secure in their right to have commerce and transportation proceed without interruption. The great mass of the people will never consent to freeze and to starve while employers and employees abandon their duty to the public to engage in combat to settle their differences by force instead of having them settled by application of the rules of justice and equity. Law and order must be maintained. All the people of this country must be thoroughly Americanized. Education must be encouraged to this end. It is impossible for a man to become an intelligent or even a safe elector in this country who can not read and understand our Constitution and laws and our history. This country will not tolerate any divided allegiance on the part of its citizens. There is no grander political status in the world than that held by an American citizen. Every American must be that and nothing else. He must be 100 per cent American. Abraham Lincoln said that this was a Government of the people, for the people, and by the people. It can not be too firmly insisted that it is also a Government of the whole people and not of any class. This is a representative form of government. The political power of the people is expressed and carried into action through their representatives in their legislative bodies. These legislative bodies must be absolutely free and independent from all attempt at coercion or intimidation. Their members should be in close touch with their constituents, but they should express their honest judgment in laws and should never yield to threats or attempts to influence their acts in the interest of particular parts of the people against the whole.

We should always preserve in a perfect state of preparation an adequate army and navy. It should never be forgotten that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. We have too much at stake to ever again commit the fatal folly of being caught unprepared to defend ourselves. The war has not changed human nature, nor has it allayed permanently the jealousies and ambitions of nations. We have become the greatest world power. Our export trade has increased to a point which would have been deemed to be impossible a few years ago. We are in possession of a great fleet of merchant ships. They must be operated under the American flag to carry our goods to the uttermost ends of the earth and to bring to us the products of all the world. The American flag is to float upon the seven seas, and that flag and the ships which carry it must be protected, together with our citizens, everywhere. We have no intention of committing any aggression upon any nation of the world. We desire no more territory, and we have taken none as a result of the war. We desire and we think we deserve the friendship of all nations. We wish them all, happiness and prosperity. We desire to do everything possible, both as a government and as a people, to promote peace and good will upon earth, and it is our duty to set a good example in this respect. There has never been a great calamity in any part of the world to the relief of which America has not been the first to extend aid in generous measure. We welcome to our shores and to the protecting folds of our flag and the guaranties of justice and equality prescribed in our institutions the poor and oppressed of every land and of every clime. All we ask of them is to be industrious and loyal to the land of their adoption.

It is impossible to enumerate the vast array of progressive and beneficial legislative enactments which may be necessary during the process of restoring our Government to the people. This is a government of parties, and parties must be held responsible for carrying out their platform pledges and providing for the welfare of the people as emergencies arise and as the needs of the hour may dictate. The Republican Party appeals to its record in peace and in war since the preservation of the Union as a guaranty that if the country again intrusts it with power it can be relied upon to promote the prosperity and preserve the independence of the whole people of the land.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (at 12 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.). The morning business is closed.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12272, the Agricultural appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I understand the question pending before the Senate is the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] to the amendment of the committee increasing the appropriation for fire protection from $125,000 to $200,000. Yesterday, when that question was pending, I was under the impression that the paragraph relating to forest fires, beginning at the bottom of page 93 and ending on line 6, page 98, was pending. I understand, however, that that was disposed of. My attention was diverted for a moment, and I did not know that we had reached the next paragraph.

I find no fault with any Senator for offering amendments and asking for increases where it is absolutely necessary. I failed on yesterday to state that the Appropriations Committee took care of this proposition last year. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] knows more about it than I do. But at no time has there been a disposition upon the part of Congress to deny the people in the fire-stricken sections of the country funds for the protection of the forests.

I do not think we should increase this item above the amount allowed by the Senate committee. The House allowed $75,000 for this cooperative work. The Senate committee increased it $50,000, making a total appropriation for the work of $125,000.

I do not care further to delay the Senate and simply ask for a vote unless some other Senator wishes to be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the amendment to the amendment was agreed to yesterday, and the question now is upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, just a word. I went into this matter yesterday afternoon somewhat in detail, and it is unnecessary to repeat what I then said.

So far as this appropriation is concerned, the law originally provided $200,000 for cooperation with the States that desire to participate in the fund. According to my understanding of the matter the Secretary of Agriculture this year estimated for $200,000. The House cut the appropriation to $75,000. I and others appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate, and upon the showing then made the Senate committee increased the appropriation to $125,000. But I called attention yesterday to a fact that I repeat to-day, that there were 24 States which last year participated in this $100,000 fund, the amount which was appropriated last year, and of that sum twenty-six thousand and some odd dollars were allotted to the Western States, in which there is now one-half of all the standing merchantable timber in the United States and 80 per cent of all the timber that is still in Government ownership.

I have not the least doubt in the world that it is a matter of vital importance that the appropriation be increased to the sum originally estimated for by the Secretary of Agriculture. The State of Idaho received but about $4,500 last year and expended $98,000, approximately, in fighting fires. Private lumbering companies in northern Idaho expended $260,000. I fail utterly to see any valid reason why there should be any objection to an increase in this appropriation to the amount estimated for originally by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Of course, after the House reduced the appropriation to $75,000 the new Secretary of Agriculture stated that it was his desire that the appropriation be increased, if I remember correctly, to at least $100,000, but with the sums expended by the various Western States $100,000 allotted to 24 States is, as a matter of fact, comparatively speaking, a mere bagatelle.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I wish to know how we legislate in this body, whether it is done by a majority or by a minority or by the chairmen of committees or by conferees. Yesterday when this amendment was up this is what transpired. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] said:

> Mr. President, I find no fault with the announcement of the Chair. I fully realize that the amendment is carried, and I agree to that; but I simply want to say that the Senator from Idaho is endangering the amount of $60,000, because the probability is that the whole thing will go out in conference. It was my purpose, as chairman of the committee, to keep the $60,000 in the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. I think perhaps the Senator from South Carolina did not hear my statement this morning. I stated that my attention was diverted for the moment, that I was interrupted by some Senator, and I had reference to the $60,000 appropriation for fire patrol.

Mr. DIAL. Yes; I am just getting to that point. I want to call attention to it. Further, the Senator from North Dakota said:

> I must confess to the Senate that I can not and will not in conference agree to the increased amount carried in the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. President, I say if that is the attitude of the Senator, then it occurs to me that it would be improper for him to sit in the conference, as I understand conferees are appointed to carry out the will of the majority of the Senate as expressed by our votes here.

Mr. GRONNA. I am perfectly willing to leave that to the Senate, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DIAL. If the Senator had reference to another item, then, of course, my remarks do not apply to the one that is pending.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand that the Chair held that the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] to the committee amendment had been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ruling yesterday was that the amendment to the amendment had been agreed to, and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] reserved a separate vote on the item in the Senate. That is what the RECORD shows. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 99, line 11, after the word "elsewhere," to strike out "$30,000" and insert "$40,000," so as to make the clause read:

Experiments in dairying and live-stock production in semiarid and irrigated districts of the western United States: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to conduct investigations and experiments in problems connected with the establishment of dairying and meat-production enterprises on the semiarid and irrigated lands of the western United States, including the purchase of live stock, and the employment of necessary persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 99, line 13, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$60,000" and insert "$75,000," so as to read:

That not to exceed $75,000 of the lump-sum appropriations herein made for the Department of Agriculture shall be available for the maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles necessary in the conduct of the field work of the Department of Agriculture outside the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 99, in line 15, before the word "maintenance," to insert "purchase."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the House refused to insert the word "purchase" in this item for "motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles necessary in the conduct of the field work of the Department of Agriculture outside the District of Columbia. I was wondering whether it would not be better to leave out the word "purchase," because of the fact that the War Department now has a great many automobiles, and particularly trucks, on hand that are virtually rusting and deteriorating, until in a little while they will not be worth anything. I think it very unwise for the Government of the United States to purchase additional trucks or automobiles for one bureau when another department has a surplus of them. We have so many of these vehicles now that they can not all be kept under cover; and if the Agricultural Department desires an automobile or a truck we should insert a provision in the bill authorizing the transfer from the War Department to the Agricultural Department of trucks or automobiles as may be required for the particular use named in this provision.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to read from my notes in reference to this provision:

The changes proposed in this item by the Senate committee amendment merely restore the identical language in the act for the current fiscal year. This paragraph carries no appropriation. It simply authorizes the use of a small portion of the lump-fund appropriation of the various bureaus for the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles. Under the House bill the total that may be used for this purpose was reduced from $75,000 to $60,000, and the authority to purchase passenger-carrying vehicles for the $15,000 which has heretofore been available has been eliminated.

It is the intention of the bill as reported to allow them to use not to exceed $15,000 for the purchase of vehicles.

Mr. SMOOT. This provision states:

That not to exceed $75,000—

The House fixed the amount at $60,000, but the Senate committee has stricken out "$60,000" and inserted "$75,000"— of the lump-sum appropriations herein made for the Department of Agriculture shall be available for the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles necessary in the conduct of the field work of the Department of Agriculture outside the District of Columbia.

Then follows a proviso:

Provided, That not to exceed $15,000 of this amount shall be expended for the purchase of such vehicles, and that such vehicles shall be used only for official service outside the District of Columbia, but this shall not prevent the continued use for official service of motor trucks in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GRONNA. I see the Senator's point, and I have no objection to striking out the word "purchase," on line 15, page 99.

Mr. SMOOT. That should be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Utah to move an amendment to that effect?

Mr. SMOOT. All that is necessary in order to reach the matter is for the Senate to disagree to the committee amendment inserting the word "purchase."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 99, in line 19, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "Provided, That not to exceed $15,000 of this amount shall be expended for the purchase of such vehicles, and that such vehicles shall be used only for official service outside the District of Columbia, but this shall not prevent the continued use for official service of motor trucks in the District of Columbia."

Mr. SMOOT. This amendment also contains the $15,000 added to the $60,000 item, making $75,000 "for the purchase of such vehicles, and that such vehicles shall be used only for official service outside the District of Columbia." I think we ought to disagree to the amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. I was perfectly willing to disagree to the amendment on line 15, because I can clearly see that that would permit the total amount to be used for purchasing vehicles, but the proviso specifically states that—

Not to exceed $15,000 of this amount shall be expended for the purchase of such vehicles.

The department is very anxious to have at least $15,000 for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the $60,000 remain as the House provided, and then add a provision authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer to the Department of Agriculture one truck or one automobile or whatever number they may desire.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that the automobiles generally used for the Agricultural Department may not be found in the list of automobiles owned by the War Department. As the Senator knows, the Agricultural Department use inexpensive cars, because they are much cheaper to operate than the expensive cars; and I doubt if the War Department has any of the cheaper cars.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether they have or not.

Mr. GRONNA. I think it would be economy, especially in the use of gasoline, to purchase new, inexpensive cars which can make from 20 to 27 miles per gallon of gasoline, whereas the larger cars make only from 8 to 10 miles per gallon.

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize the fact that the Senator is right as to that proposition.

Mr. GRONNA. I hope the Senate will not disagree to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps we had better let it go to conference, and it can be adjusted there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, in the side heading on page 100, line 11, to strike out the words "including the blowfly and screw worm in live stock and poultry."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 102, line 5, after the word "elsewhere," to strike out "$288,560" and insert "$588,560," so as to make the clause read:

Eradication of pink bollworm: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the existence of the pink bollworm of cotton in Mexico, and to prevent the establishment of such insect in the United States by the employment of all means necessary, including rent outside of the District of Columbia and the employment of persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $588,560, as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 103, line 12, after the word "distribution," to strike out "$125,000" and insert "$425,000, of which amount $200,000 shall be immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

To conduct surveys and inspections in Texas or in any other State to detect any infestation and to conduct such control measures, including the establishment of cotton-free areas, in cooperation with the State of Texas or other States concerned, as may be necessary to stamp out such infestation, to establish in cooperation with the States concerned a zone or zones free from cotton culture on or near the border of any State or States adjacent to Mexico, and to cooperate with the Mexican Government or local Mexican authorities, or otherwise, by undertaking in Mexico such measures for the extermination of the pink bollworm of cotton as shall be determined to be practicable from surveys showing its distribution, $425,000, of which amount $200,000 shall be immediately available: Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used to pay the cost or value of crops or other property injured or destroyed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 103, after line 16, to insert:

Prevention of spread of European corn borer: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the spread of the European corn borer, and to provide means for the control and prevention of spread of this insect throughout the United States, in cooperation with the States concerned, including employment of persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses, $500,000, of which $250,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, as I understand, only committee amendments are now being considered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is all.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have an amendment to offer at this point, but I will wait until it is in order for Senators to offer amendments from the floor.

CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. BORAH. I ask permission at this time, if the Senator in charge of the pending bill does not object, to introduce a bill and have it referred. I ask that the bill be read in full.

The bill (S. 4134) to provide for the publicity of campaign contributions was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, as follows:

A bill (S. 4134) to provide for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing the election of delegates to national conventions at which candidates for President are to be selected.

Be it enacted, etc., That no candidate for President shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise or cause to be given, contributed, used, or promised in procuring his nomination for the Presidency any sum in the aggregate in excess of $10,000 for any one State: Provided, That money expended by any such candidate for his necessary personal expenses incurred for himself alone for traveling and subsistence, stationery and postage, writing or printing (other than the newspapers), and distributing letters, circulars, and posters, and for telegraph and telephone service shall not be regarded as an expenditure within the meaning of this section and shall not be considered any part of the sum herein fixed as the limit of expense and need not be shown in the statements herein required to be filed.

SEC. 2. That the expenditures made or caused to be made by any individual, committee, or association or corporation upon behalf of a candidate of which the candidate has knowledge shall be included in the amount provided for in the foregoing section: Provided, That the candidate shall not be criminally responsible for expenditures under this section after he shall have publicly made protest against such expenditures.

SEC. 3. That any person, partnership, corporation, or organization that makes any contribution for the purpose of securing the nomination of any candidate for President, in excess of $100, shall, within one day after making such contribution, notify the Attorney General of the United States at Washington, D. C., of the making of such contribution, giving the full name and the post-office address of the person, partnership, corporation, or organization to whom or to which said contribution is made. The Attorney General shall keep a list of such contributions, by whom made, and to whom made, and said lists shall be open to public inspection at all times. Any person, partnership, corporation, or organization making such contribution and failing to comply in full with the terms of this section shall be deemed guilty of a felony and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $25,000 or by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not more than three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 4. That every candidate for the nomination for President shall within 15 days prior to the nominating convention and within 30 days after such nominating convention file with the Attorney General of the United States a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent from any source in aid or support of his candidacy for nomination, together with the names of those who have furnished the same in whole or in part, and such statements shall contain a true and itemized account of all money and things of value given, contributed, used, or promised by such candidate or by his agent, representative, or other person for and in his behalf with his knowledge and consent up to and for the last day of such nominating convention, together with all the names of those to whom any of such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring his nomination: Provided, That it shall not be necessary to incorporate in the last statement any item included in the first statement herein provided for.

Any person who shall violate or conspire with another to violate this act shall be deemed guilty of a felony and, upon trial and conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $20,000 or by punishment in the penitentiary for the term of not more than two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not want to be inquisitive, but has the Senator from Idaho been favored with an expression of views by each of the candidates bearing upon this subject?

Mr. BORAH. Not yet.

Mr. President, this measure, of course, can not be considered as having its origin either from a party standpoint or from an individual standpoint; but the developments thus early in this campaign, it seems to me, make it necessary for the Congress to take some notice of the situation.

I have drawn this measure in some degree of haste, having in mind the forcing of publicity rather than criminal punishment, although both are provided for. It does seem to me that we ought to enact some measure which would compel publicity in regard to this preconvention expenditure. We have covered some phases of our campaigns with measures which are already part of the laws of the land, but there seems to be no law covering the expenditures of preconvention campaigns. This bill is designed to cover that, and that alone.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. Inasmuch as it requires such a long time to pass a law, does not the Senator believe that a resolution of investigation of campaign expenditures in both parties by all candidates would accomplish the purpose desired?

Mr. BORAH. No. However, I am thoroughly in favor of such a resolution. It does ordinarily take considerable time to pass these laws; but I do not believe that the Congress can hesitate, in the face of the situation that now confronts us, to act as speedily as practicable. Such a law, of course, can not be passed out of hand; but there is no reason why it should not be passed to be effective 40 days prior to the convening of the convention at Chicago. I agree with the Senator from Iowa, however, that a resolution of investigation might be of considerable effect just now. However, in my opinion, if those who have been charged with these expenditures do not report to the public voluntarily, the judgment which will be rendered against them will be quite as effective as any investigation which will be made by Congress.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. My attention was diverted during a portion of the time the Secretary was reading the Senator's bill. Is it broad enough to require reports from the donors and users of money, as well as the candidates?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is, it is intended to be, and I think it is.

Mr. THOMAS. There is, as the Senator knows, an open movement, rather boldly or loudly proclaimed, by the American Federation of Labor, that they propose to enter the primaries for the purpose of nominating union candidates, and then undertake to elect them and defeat their opponents. Assuming that to be true, it must carry with it a proposed expenditure of money; and I should like to inquire whether the Senator's bill is broad enough to include such expenditures?

Mr. BORAH. This bill is broad enough to cover any expenditures of that kind made with reference to the presidential nomination. It is not intended to go into the other questions, because I think they are largely covered by Federal laws and State laws already upon the statute books with reference to Representatives and Members of the Senate; but it is broad enough to cover anyone who contributes or takes part, either for or against a presidential candidate, in securing his nomination. This is designed solely to cover the preconvention campaign. If, however, when it gets into the committee, or when it comes from the committee to the Senate, it is deemed advisable to cover any defects in the present law, certainly I have no objection.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I notice that the order was made that this bill should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BORAH. Was it referred to the Judiciary Committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was referred to that committee. The reference will be changed if the Senator desires.

Mr. BORAH. I did not observe that. I intended that it should go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so directed, and the bill will go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. POMERENE. I called attention to the fact because I thought that would be the proper committee to which it should go. I have no particular desire about it.

Mr. BORAH. Did the Senator desire to have it sent to the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. POMERENE. No; I did not. My attention was called to the fact that it was ordered referred to the Judiciary Committee, but I felt that it was properly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Privileges and Elections; and, while in the past they have taken up this subject of expenditures at various times, they have not been able to get any action by the Senate, at least not within the last three years, except on the bill which was introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and which related to the fraudulent purchasing of votes. A subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, consisting of the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], presented a bill which was the result of many weeks, not to say months, of study.

It never got further, I believe, than to be reported to the full committee. Later on, I introduced that same bill in the Senate, and no action has been taken upon it since that time. It was reintroduced on November 21, 1918, and if the Senator will permit me I will reintroduce the bill now and let it go to the same committee so that it may be taken up for consideration.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. In view of the statement of the Senator from Ohio about the report of a subcommittee of which I happened to be a member, made I think three years ago, and in view of the fact that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and myself worked for some months on a bill that has not yet gotten by the committee and been reported to the Senate, I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks this bill will be out before the convention period?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know. The Senator realizes the difficulties. I was one of those who favored that bill. There are certain features of it that are open to serious discussion. I do not know what will come of it. I should like to have action upon this matter. I think it would be doing a real service to the country if we could get some proper legislation regulating these large expenditures of money. We are all familiar with the conflicts between the Federal laws and the State laws, and the jurisdiction of the Congress and the jurisdiction of the several States, and I think that leads to many of the troubles that have presented themselves to some senatorial minds.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is altogether probable, I suppose, in view of the past experience of the Senate with reference to these measures, that there will be some delay in enacting this measure. However, one of the things that the Senate sometimes does is to enact legislation, and it often acts under the inspiration of an exigency or emergency, and sometimes very promptly. In any event, I found no law upon the statute books covering this particular situation. It has been advertised over the country that there was no such law, and I take it that the gentlemen who are making these expenditures feel sure that there is no such law. It was incumbent upon us, therefore, it seemed to me, to make a start. There is no reason why it should not be passed within the next 20 days. In the meantime, however, I shall be glad to support a resolution of investigation, although I have very little faith in investigations. They generally result in a long delay, and by the time the investigation has been completed public interest has died away, and also interest in the Senate. Nevertheless, this may be an instance in which it will do good.

Just a word further, Mr. President. For many years in this country the use of money in elections has been growing with a rapid pace. The extent to which this practice has gone in the control of our preconvention campaigns, and also our elections, is really astounding, and there is every indication that the year 1920 upon both sides of the fence is to see a perfect saturnalia of expenditures in matters of election.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether this can not be regarded as an instance of the high cost of living?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator's observation seems rather irrelevant.

Mr. President, some time ago one of the representatives of the Democratic Party stated in the New York Times, under date of August 24, 1919, that it was proposed to raise $10,000,000 for this campaign. If that is true, it will be proposed to raise a like sum upon the Republican side.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, did not the Senator also read afterwards that the chairman of the Democratic committee denied that statement, and that there was no such statement made?

Mr. BORAH. The statement that I have I think was made. I always quote the New York Times news reports with confidence. I do not remember the denial; but if there was a denial, I am very glad to have it stated. But, Mr. President, that is only a slight indication of what is actually going on now. The amount of money which is actually being expended to control both the national conventions is perfectly shocking.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, the Senator is correct in his view that money should not be used to influence elections, but it does no good to talk in a circuitous way. What the country and the Senate want to know is who is spending this money. The Senator from Idaho is a Senator of great power and great responsibility, but this general talk will be of no value. If, however, you say that John Smith is spending so much money, you stop him right there. Now, I want to know who is spending this money. I want the Democrat named who is spending money, so that the condemnation of an outraged public conscience may fall on that Democrat. I want the Republican named and the Socialist named who are spending this money illegally. It does no good to talk this way, around the bush. Let us say who is spending the money, not say that there is a report here that somebody is spending it. Name the man, and you will stop improper expenditures mighty quick.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am always delighted to have a lecture from the Senator from Arizona. I trust he will continue in the same frame of mind throughout the entire fight. I am going to name the parties so far as I know them. If the Senator from Arizona will be equally vigilant and tell the people the names which possibly he knows, possibly together we can make an interesting case for the public.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I would be quick to tell the public the name of any person who I knew or could prove was spending money improperly in this election or primary campaign. I know of no one at this time in the Democratic Party who is spending money improperly. If I did, I do not need to tell the Senate that I would name the gentleman. But I do not know of anyone, and I can not prove that anyone is, just as I can not prove that a Democrat is trying to get a third term now. I would not hesitate a moment to tell the country that that was wrong.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator does not know that the third term is being urged, then the Senator is blessed with an innocence which I did not suppose ever characterized the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator from Idaho know that anyone is trying to get a third term? Does the Senator say that he knows it?

Mr. BORAH. I read a letter a few moments ago which convinced me that the move is on.

Mr. ASHURST. I would like to have that letter read here.

Mr. BORAH. Call on Mr. Jerry Matthews and he will show it to you. I think, Mr. President, that the President of the United States is entitled to a third term in view of the situation on the treaty. Who else is going to lead the fight? Who else is entitled to lead the fight? He stood bravely by his convictions. Why should not the Democrats rally around the man who thus exhibits his great faith in the cause?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho means a third nomination, not a third term?

Mr. BORAH. If the candidate of the Senator from New Hampshire keeps on with his present practice and is nominated, it will, I am afraid, be a third term. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The galleries will be in order. There must be no expression of approval or disapproval by the occupants of the galleries of any remark by a Senator on the floor. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the difficulty of presenting this matter at this time, of course, is that the party presenting it will be charged either with personal antipathies or with partisan feeling. I certainly have not any partisan feeling in regard to it, because the most I shall have to say will be in regard to the practice in my own party. I have not any personal antipathy in regard to it, because if the gentlemen who are charged with these exorbitant expenditures will come out and state the actual facts and satisfy the public, so far as I am concerned I shall be entirely satisfied with their program. I do not ask for anything other than the statement of these gentlemen who are candidates as to who their subscribers are, how much they have subscribed, and what they are doing with the money. I am perfectly willing to accept their statement if they will state facts and not avoid the specific charges.

What I object to, Mr. President, is that men who are candidates for the Presidency on the Republican side have been deliberately charged with having expended vast sums of money, that they have turned themselves over practically to a coterie of financiers, of men who have gathered vast wealth, and are permitting their campaigns to be conducted by those men; and it has every appearance, to the man in the street, and to the onlooker, that it is their deliberate determination through the use of money to control the Republican convention at Chicago. What must the people think when they see on every hand what appears to be a perfect orgie of expenditure and read these charges and hear no denial. If there is a denial possible, honest, self-respecting men would hasten to make it. They would make it out of a sense of self-respect, out of a sense of duty to the party and to the country. As a Republican and as a citizen, I have a right to ask that these charges be met.

There is only one way to meet that kind of a proposition, and that is for the man who is the candidate and charged with the offense to state to the public the actual facts in regard to it. If they will meet the proposition which has been made, and meet it in a candid, open way, then the question will be settled so far as I am individually concerned. I do not believe that any of these men would come out before the public and undertake to make a statement of fact which is not fact; but when they remain in complete silence under this class of charges there is only one inference to be drawn, and that is that the charges made are true.

Mr. President, as I started to say a few moments ago, the last 10 years have witnessed an ever-increasing use of money in American elections. In the last 10 years we have seen here in this Chamber one man expelled because of the use of money in his election, another tried by the Senate, who barely escaped expulsion, and he ought to have been expelled, and now we suffer the humiliation of having a third convicted by a jury. I shall not, of course, indulge in a discussion of the latter case. The time has not come yet to discuss that in the Senate. But must we not take into consideration, in view of this history, that conditions have reached the point where it is obligatory upon us to do everything that legislators may do in order to curtail this vicious practice?

Men do not think of the expending of money in an election as they look upon other practices, so long as there is no law upon the statute books. It is tossed aside and disregarded, and the thought that a party is committing a crime, or is guilty of moral obliquity, seldom is entertained by the parties who are actually doing the wrong. There is only one way, apparently, to bring it home to them, and that is to put a statute upon the statute books so that they will be advised that the public sentiment of the country as crystallized into law is to the effect that such action is to be designated and punished as a crime.

What is the difference between the man who unfortunately stands convicted of this offense under the law, and the men who are candidates for President who are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars? What is the difference between the two men in the court of conscience on the moral proposition? There is no difference at all. It is true that the man who came under the terms of the statute receives his punishment. The only reason why the others do not receive their punishment is because Congress has not hitherto done its duty in covering that particular situation as well as the one which is covered. I have introduced this bill, therefore, for the purpose of bringing it home to the attention of the Senate, so that we may enact proper legislation.

Such things as this, Mr. President, are being printed over the country, and so far with no denial. How shall the Republican Party meet such a charge?

Mr. THOMAS. From what is the Senator about to read?

Mr. BORAH. From this morning's New York Sun:

Branding Maj. Gen. Wood's presidential campaign in the State of Indiana as being fought under the slogan of "Get the nomination at any price" and making the sensational charge that testimonials of indorsement have been bought at $2.50 each, while wires and mails have been clogged with news like medicine advertisements, the Indiana Daily Times this evening printed the following:

"'Get the nomination at any cost.' This word has been passed down the line in the Leonard Wood organization, and his Indiana managers at least have taken those who are financing the campaign at their word.

"The latest publicity plan resorted to is that of obtaining paid 'testimonials.' The Wood campaign thus far has resembled to a great extent a patent-medicine advertising campaign. The testimonials read something like this:

"'Mr. Adolphus Jones, a street-car conductor living on Yandes Street, has indorsed the nomination of Gen. Wood. "I think Gen. Wood would make a good President," said Mr. Jones.'

"The reason for the numerous testimonials has now been revealed. They are being paid for at the rate of $2.50 apiece."

I am advised by a gentleman with whom you are all well acquainted that there are plenty of affidavits, sworn to in an adjoining State, to the same effect.

Mr. President, certainly Gen. Wood himself would not indulge in any such practice; it is inconceivable; but he is responsible before the country if he accepts the benefit of the action of those who do indulge in any such a practice. These men who have supposed that you can buy the nomination and corrupt the American electorate are beginning by paying $2.50 for a testimonial. What will they pay for votes? What will they pay for delegates.

Mr. Wood's managers say that Mr. Lowden, another candidate, is spending more money than they are, and that is the defense which is made, so far, by the representatives of the Wood campaign.

I am inclined to think that is true. There is some indication of it, although I must say for Mr. Lowden's managers that they have expended it with more adroitness and under a better system than the Wood managers.

But, Mr. President, think of the shameless condition of affairs. Two months and a half before the national conventions shall meet men are charged with spending hundreds of thousands of dollars, and their answer is that another man is spending more. There is no honest purpose to be served by putting hundreds of thousands and even millions into a nominative campaign, and the people will not accept the expenditure as being made for an honest purpose.

In my opinion, Mr. President, in less than 10 days, if Mr. Wilson should get out of the campaign, you will find that the amount of money which is expended by those two gentlemen is being in some respects equaled by two candidates on the other side of the fence, at a time, sir, when the people of this country are greatly distressed, when the cost of living is such as to worry and torment the people as to how they shall get through with their affairs. It is no less than criminal that such practices should be flaunted in the face of the people. These war profiteers have apparently combined their efforts and their power and their finances for the purpose of actually controlling the two national conventions through the means of money.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. If they can succeed in doing that in both parties, then, of course, they need make no further effort in the matter; they can go to sleep.

Mr. BORAH. They can not go to sleep, because there will be a fire alarm at midnight.

Mr. THOMAS. I assume the Senator, before he takes his seat, will supply the Senate with the names of the two Democratic aspirants to whom he has made reference.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I hope the Senator will supply the names of those Democrats who are spending money improperly, because I had up to this point taken no direct interest in the coming national conventions, hoping and believing that an excellent Democrat would be nominated at San Francisco; but if the Senator will give me the names of the two men or any other Democrats who are now spending money illegally, I shall engage in a little activity to see that those gentleman are deprived of some delegations that they might otherwise get. I should like to know their names.

Mr. BORAH. They are not spending it illegally because there is no law against it.

Mr. ASHURST. Are they spending money improperly?

Mr. BORAH. Look over the country. Observe what is going on. It is all right to say present your proof. I say the proof is on everybody's lips.

Mr. ASHURST. I have not been out on lecture tours. I have been here for eight or nine months, and I do not know about the situation except from what I see in the papers.

Mr. BORAH. Why should Senators sit here and be the most innocent cherubs in the whole country?

Mr. ASHURST. It is well to be innocent sometimes.

Mr. BORAH. I claim that when a Senator who is discharging his duty here is so innocent that he does not know what is going on in the country which everybody else knows, it is time that he would resign and go home.

Mr. ASHURST. There are many of us who would serve our country better by resigning than by remaining here, and I am not alone in that class. But what I want is the facts, if the Senator will give them to me. The Senator has stated that two Democrats are now spending large sums of money attempting to control the conventions and thus obtain the nomination for themselves or for some other person. The country has faith in what the Senator from Idaho says. My duty to resign is no higher than his duty to disclose such situation if he really knows the same to exist. It is better to pretend innocence than to pretend that somebody else is guilty and that we know it, and then not disclose the name of the one who is guilty.

Mr. BORAH. I will give the Senator all the facts just as fast as I can get them.

Mr. ASHURST. That is all I ask.

Mr. BORAH. I will give the Senator all the facts before this debate ends, for I intend to pursue this matter from now to convention adjournments.

Mr. ASHURST. That is all I ask.

Mr. BORAH. But I am not going to flush the covey until I get the facts I want.

Mr. ASHURST. I am not sufficiently familiar with poker nomenclature to know what that expression means.

Mr. BORAH. That has nothing to do with poker; it has reference to hunting partridges. [Laughter.]

I will read now from the New York World of March 22:

The World has obtained the following facts:

1. That the initial promotion of the Wood boom was undertaken by Dan R. Hanna, son of the old-time national boss, who "put McKinley over," who undertook to raise $600,000 to be used to bring about the nomination of Gen. Wood.

2. That John T. King, the Republican boss of southern Connecticut and national committeeman from that State, was retained by Gen. Wood and Hanna to manage the Wood campaign, and did so up to two months ago, when he retired in favor of W. C. Procter, the Cincinnati millionaire soap manufacturer, who is now in command of the Wood forces.

3. That King, while acting as political manager for Gen. Wood, raised and disbursed $101,000 contributed by Gen. Wood's personal friends on a promissory note negotiated by him, and $11,000 which he (King) personally provided and for which he was reimbursed.

Two months ago it was reported around the Capitol here, time and time again, that 10 men had sat down to underwrite Mr. Wood's campaign for $100,000 each. Now it is published in a responsible newspaper.

4. That the underwriting of the Wood boom was to have been $1,000,000, made up of contributions of $100,000 each by 10 men, and that the most definite information is that $20,000 of each contribution has thus far been made.

5. That all of the contributions sought and actually made came from men connected with railroad, banking, oil, life insurance, public utility, and other transportation and industrial corporations, the aggregate investment of which is in excess of $1,000,000,000.

MEN OF WEALTH AS THE UNDERWRITERS.

While it would probably require an investigation to determine the exact amount of contributions made to promote the Wood presidential boom, the World is in possession of information which shows that the gentlemen named herewith participated in the underwriting of the Wood syndicate:

Edward L. Doheny, president of the Mexican Petroleum Co., and officer and director in other oil companies, railroads, and banks, with an aggregate capital and investment of $500,000,000.

I do not know whether Mr. Doheny is contributing for the other side of the campaign now or not, but I am informed he did in the last campaign; and he is a candidate for delegate at large to the Democratic national convention from California.

Ambrose Monel, officer and director in nickel, phosphate, motor, steel, bank, and other corporations, with an aggregate capital of more than $215,000,000.

Harry F. Sinclair, head of the Sinclair Oil & Refining Co. and other corporations, and officer and director in many corporations, baseball promoter and racing commissioner of New York State, whose interests total more than $250,000,000.

H. M. Byllesby, officer and director in 29 transportation, light, heat, power, oil, steel, and other corporations in the Middle and Far Western States, the aggregate capital stock of which exceeds $200,000,000.

W. B. Thompson, copper magnate, director in Federal reserve bank and officer and director in many corporations, including the Utah and Inspiration Copper Cos., and the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. of New York.

Dan R. Hanna, capitalist of Cleveland, Ohio, with interests involving hundreds of millions of dollars in steel, banks, and Lake transportation corporations.

It has been stated to me by a perfectly responsible party that Mr. Hanna stated that he would spend $100,000 to carry the city of Cleveland, and stated it publicly.

E. E. Smathers, capitalist, of New York, promoter of racing and baseball, art connoisseur, with large financial interests.

A. A. Sprague, head of one of the largest wholesale grocery houses in Chicago and director in many corporations.

I read that to call attention to the fact that this has now been published for several days. There has been no denial of the facts stated upon the part of either of the candidates or of those who are managing their campaigns. I must conclude, the country must conclude, that a denial of the facts can not be made. This is the record which these men are building up against the Republican Party. This is the shame they are bringing on the Republic itself. I denounce it. It is intolerable. It means the utter destruction of all confidence upon the part of our people in the party and in our institutions.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Has the Senator any information as to whether these distinguished gentlemen are confining their contributions to the campaign of one candidate or may they not be contributing to several others?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know about that. The managers of the Wood campaign claim that Mr. Lowden has his own money; that he does not have to take any contributions; and that is the distinction between the two. I am not able to state in regard to that?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They do that sometimes, do they not?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; they do that sometimes. I stated a moment ago that Mr. Doheny would be in San Francisco as the representative of the Democratic Party of California and he will have contributed $100,000, less or more, to the selection of a candidate for the Republicans. It is also stated that Mr. Doheny has large oil interests in Mexico, and it is very probable that the next administration will have to deal very effectively with the Mexican question. All these things naturally gave rise to suspicion that these gentlemen are looking to the protection of their interests from both sides. It may not be true, but it will be believed to be true if some denial is not made.

The Wood managers put out this campaign statement:

The Lowden campaign fund has not been attacked, nor has that of Mr. Hoover, although both of these other candidates are personally wealthier men than Gen. Wood—whose Army salary is all that he has—and their campaign funds are probably considerably larger. Gov. Lowden is a multimillionaire, with all the wealth of the Pullman interests behind him, and it is evident that Hoover's campaign is amply financed by various wealthy men. It is obviously another evidence of Gen. Wood's strength that the attack is made upon him and upon those independent admirers who have come forward voluntarily and supplied the sinews for the campaign that is intended to educate the Republican voters of the country to the Nation's predicament, its present needs, and the eminent qualifications and character of Gen. Wood.

Mr. President, I received a letter from a gentleman, former friend of mine, complaining very bitterly that while I was attacking Gen. Wood I was not attacking Mr. Lowden. I telegraphed him that I would use any facts which he could supply me with concerning Mr. Lowden or any other gentleman who was in the campaign.

Mr. President, I have no desire to conceal anything in regard to this matter. I simply believe that a national peril confronts us, and I want to get the facts before the country, even if I have to do it in what will be denounced a brutal way, to force some action in regard to the matter. If these gentlemen are not guilty, they have it within their own power to establish their innocence within 48 hours.

I do not hesitate to say that if any candidate for the Presidency is accepting such stupendous favors from those who have their many millions to expend, it is proof positive that they will be called upon to return these favors after they are elected President. Men do not put their millions into a campaign without the expectation of return in some way and somewhere along the line. These are not beneficent benefactors who do not care whether they get any return for their investments or not. They are men who are undertaking to control political conventions for the purpose of securing political results. It is the duty, therefore, of Mr. Wood and Mr. Lowden and of all these other gentlemen who have been named, to give the American public once and for all the details of who are the subscribers and how much they are subscribing and what they are doing with it.

Why, sir, if I should state representations received by me from South Dakota—and the only reason I do not is because I do not know the gentleman personally who sends them—for every vote cast in South Dakota for either Mr. Wood or Mr. Lowden they have expended at least $10. If it is true that Mr. Wood got 29,000 votes and Mr. Lowden 23,000 or 24,000, according to the amount of money which it is claimed by those, some of whom live in South Dakota, that was expended there, they have paid for them in expenditure equal to $10 for every vote that was cast. How long can we tolerate such a proposition? Shall those Republicans who shut their eyes to such a condition of affairs now be able to defend their party against such practices when the campaign shall have opened? Now is the time to clean the Augean stables; and regardless of whom it hits or hurts, regardless of the enemies it may make, now is the time for the Republicans to clear the situation and either establish the cleanness of their candidates or deal with them at Chicago as unclean candidates should be dealt with.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I share the Senator's detestation, if I may use that word, of the large expenditure of money in elections, and I want to join hands with the Senator in trying to remedy this situation, if it can be done; but I wish to ask the Senator this question: Has he investigated sufficiently to determine, in his own mind, what, if any, constitutional authority Congress has to deal with the subject of presidential primaries or elections? Before the Senator answers that question, if he will permit me to make an observation or two, I desire to say there is no question about our right to control primary or general elections so far as they relate to Representatives in Congress and to Senators, but our courts have held at various times that a presidential elector was not a Federal officer; that he was a State officer, and that the State legislatures have the right to provide for their appointment. That has been construed to mean either appointment by the legislature or by election. They are now elected by popular vote.

I recognize the fact that Congress has the right to determine the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they shall cast their vote, which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

I had occasion a couple of years ago when this matter was engaging the attention of the committee to look into the question of the right of Congress to control presidential primaries. I know that that matter was given very serious thought by some of the ablest lawyers of this body, and at that time we were of the opinion that we could not control the presidential primaries. I have not had the opportunity to examine the bill which has been presented by the Senator from Idaho, though I heard it in part read. It may be that it is builded upon some different theory. I hope the joint investigation of Senators will lead to a conclusion that there is this power. I present the subject now so that I, for one, may have the benefit of the Senator's views. If there is no such authority, then there ought to be an amendment to the Constitution to cover the case.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. If I understood the question of the Senator from Ohio, it was as to the power of Congress to interfere as to primaries?

Mr. POMERENE. As to presidential primaries.

Mr. KENYON. I suppose the Senator is familiar with the decision of the Supreme Court in the West Virgina case. While I can not give the details of it, that decision practically upheld the power of Congress as to primary elections where Members of Congress were elected.

Mr. POMERENE. There is no doubt about that; we clearly have the authority to control either primaries or general elections so far as they relate to Representatives in Congress or to Senators, but I am suggesting the question of our power to deal with presidential electors.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in view of the statements which have been made by the Senator from Idaho in regard to the cost incurred by two of the candidates in the primary campaign in South Dakota, I think I should say a word. I can not let the inference go unnoticed that the electorate of South Dakota have been corrupted or have yielded to bribery upon the part of the candidates or those who have managed the campaigns of those candidates.

I think, Mr. President, I know something about the voters of South Dakota, and I do not believe there is a more honest or more patriotic body of citizens in any State in this Union than are to be found in South Dakota. I do not know that the Senator said so, but the inference might be drawn from his remarks that from $25,000 to $30,000 were expended by each of those candidates in the corruption of individual voters.

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President.

Mr. STERLING. The money might have been spent; I am not denying that.

Mr. BORAH. I did not say it was used for the purchase of votes. I said for each vote obtained they had expended $10. I did not put the amount at $25,000 or $30,000 for each candidate; there is no such small sum as that involved.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator said it cost on an average $10 for each voter in South Dakota, of course it would not come down to a sum of $25,000 or $30,000, as I understood the Senator to say; but the inference might go out from that bare statement that the money was spent by paying the individual voters. I do not want any such inference—if that is the inference—to be drawn upon the people of South Dakota, for it is a reflection that is wholly unwarranted.

Mr. BORAH. I did not intend to say that they actually bought votes; I did intend to say, however, that the effect of using that money in that way is to corrupt the election.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator does not exactly say in what way—and that is one omission that runs through the Senator's argument. He does not say in what way the money was used. Vast sums, of course, are used in these days; much greater sums are now used than have been used heretofore in the matter of printing material, in the matter of advertising, and so forth; not used for the purpose of corrupting the voters, but to bring the character and virtues of the several candidates and the issues to the attention of every individual voter.

Mr. BORAH. If it takes a million dollars to present the virtues of a candidate to the voters, we had better find somebody who has virtues that do not have to be advertised so highly.

Mr. STERLING. All candidates, more or less, resort to that method, and more now than formerly, as, I think, the Senator well knows.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not understand that the Senator from Idaho is singling out any particular State of the Union except as the result of the primary which has been held in one State—and, I think, the only primary so far held—indicates the extent to which the same practices will be applied to the electorate in other States.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. THOMAS. In other words, South Dakota is no worse, when it comes to the influence exerted upon the voter by large expenditures, than Idaho or Colorado or any other of the Commonwealths of the Union.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly not; that is exactly correct; but in every community in the United States there is always a class of men who can be bought; there is another class of men whose influence can be purchased; and there are always, thank Heaven, a very large class of men who can not be purchased either directly or indirectly; but those who can be controlled by money are the men whose weight generally goes to the place where as a balance of power they will determine the question.

I do not mean to attack the people of South Dakota, but I wish to say to the Senator from South Dakota that there are a great many people in South Dakota to-day who are very indignant because of the situation. While they make no charges that any man was paid $10 for his vote, they feel that had it not been for the extravagant and unconscionable use of money the judgment of that State would have been different.

In reference to corrupting the American electorate, I call attention to the fact that there is no State in the Union which has a finer class of citizens than the State of Ohio. They have been known for their sturdiness of character, for their manhood and their womanhood ever since the great Western Reserve was first settled; yet we all recall that pitiable, pathetic scene of some seven or eight years ago when it was revealed that a large portion of the citizens of one of the counties of that State had either been directly or indirectly influenced by money in an election. By the hundreds men of unquestioned character theretofore and women accompanied their husbands to the probate judge and plead guilty of having received $5 or $10 for their votes. I have an account of that incident here upon my desk. If anyone wishes to treat lightly the use of money in American elections, let him read what money did in one of the most stable communities of the United States, in one of the best States of the Union, and how it humiliated, degraded, and debauched an entire community.

Now, sir, if millions and millions are going to be spent for the purpose of controlling conventions, if millions are going to be spent for the purpose of controlling an election, it is with the view that money counts in elections and in conventions, for otherwise it would not be spent.

I have no objection at all to any candidate for the Presidency visiting the people and discussing public questions, and any expenditure that is necessary on that account will be justified by the people without any question at all, but the money is not used in that way. If this report in the Sun this morning is correct, if the other statements which have been made are correct—and the parties are named and the publications making it are responsible—then candidates or their managers have descended to actual personal corruption; that is all there is to it.

Every single candidate in this campaign, Mr. President, has as his first and foremost plank "Americanization," the preservation of American institutions; and yet the indispensable primary quality of Americanization is to keep clean the American electorate, to withhold the use of money in the control of American elections. We can not have stable, free institutions and consent to the proposition that either conventions or elections can be controlled by money. I ask these gentlemen in advance of the enactment of this bill, in answer to the demand from the public, to say who their contributors are, the amounts that they have contributed, and how they are expending the money. If they do not do so, they should receive the condemnation of the American people regardless of party. The man who will accept money from great corporations and conceal it from the masses of the people is unfit to hold the high office of President of the United States.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Idaho presented his bill and when it was read, I assume. Therefore, I am not familiar with its provisions, and I can not pass judgment upon its effectiveness. I have heard the greater portion of what he has said in his address, however, together with the extracts which he has read from the New York World; and I wish to congratulate the New York World upon the fact that the Senator from Idaho evidently puts much more credence in the statements published in that newspaper now than he did during the course of the fight over the treaty of peace with Germany.

The alleged facts which the New York World prints, which the Indianapolis Times publishes, and which the Senator has read, I can not discuss, because I know nothing about them. I had thought that I did know something about the campaign which is being conducted in behalf of Gen. Leonard Wood; but my illusion has been shattered, because I find that the New York World and the Senator from Idaho and the Indianapolis Times know much more about it than I ever dreamed of.

I do not doubt, I do not deny, that money is being expended to promote the candidacies of men who seek the Presidency of the United States. I do not doubt—indeed, I know—that money is being expended to promote the candidacy of Gen. Leonard Wood, but that money is being expended legitimately and necessarily; and if the Senator from Idaho wishes to seek the root of this difficulty, if he wishes to do away with the expenditure of large sums of money in American political action, he should not devote himself to limiting expenditures, but he should seek out the cause and eradicate it.

Many States in the Union now select their presidential candidates by direct vote of the people in primaries, just as United States Senators are now elected by direct vote of the people, and in most States are nominated by direct primaries. In carrying the appeal of a candidate, whether for the Senate or the Presidency, to the whole body of the electorate, money must necessarily be expended, and I am here to say that money is necessarily being expended in politics to-day, and so far as the candidacy of Gen. Leonard Wood is concerned no dollar has been expended in his behalf illegitimately, and I have no doubt that if an investigation is made it will be found that the total sum comes nowhere near the tremendous amount which has been mentioned by the New York World and the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. MOSES. I can not speak with authority about this, because I do not know. I have not collected the money, and I do not know from whom it came; but, so far as my knowledge of the Leonard Wood campaign is concerned, I wish to say that it is immaculate with regard to its expenditure, and it has spent no dollar which has not been made necessary by the kind of a campaign which now has to be carried on. If the Senator from Idaho could have his way, apparently from what he says in connection with the nomination for the Presidency, a man would go out upon his front doorsteps and shout at the top of his voice, "I am a candidate for this, that, or the other office," and the people of the country would rush there the next morning and give him the nomination.

That is not possible nowadays. Money has to be spent. The Senator from Idaho knows it as well as any man in this Chamber or in the country. I have no doubt that he, as he has sought office, has received, if not solicited and probably expended, money in promoting his candidacy, legitimately and properly and for the good of the country; and what contributions have been made to the campaign fund raised in behalf of Gen. Leonard Wood have been made legitimately and will be expended properly and with a motive which makes for the good of this country, because there are men rich and poor, high and low, throughout the United States, sir, who wish to see a man of Leonard Wood's high character and courage and convictions in the Presidency of the United States. Those of us who can give only time and effort to that proposal are giving it; those who can give money have given it, and the motive is the same.

I recall to the Senator from Idaho the burning words of indignation with which he, in 1912, refuted the charge that the candidate for the nomination whom he was then supporting was receiving money improperly from men of great wealth and from corporations who hoped, it was said, to recoup themselves if they were successful in the convention. The Senator from Idaho then said that the character of the candidate whom he supported gave the denial to those assertions; and I say here in his words, though I can not say them as eloquently or with as much vigor as he then used, that the character of the candidate whom I support gives the refutation to all such calumnies.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, has the Senator the words which I spoke? I recall no occasion for such a statement.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I got them exactly as the Senator got what he read here this morning—from the columns of a newspaper.

Mr. BORAH. Where is the paper?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I was 6,000 miles away during that episode, and I read few American newspapers, but with great care. They reached me 15 days after the episode, and I followed that tragic movement in American politics with much interest, and what I read was well impressed upon my mind. While I could name to the Senator the few papers which I then read, I am not sure that I could tell him the exact one in which I read it; but this much I am certain of—the thing took place.

Mr. BORAH. The reason why I asked for it was that I did not recall that in the campaign of 1912 this particular issue was raised against Col. Roosevelt.

Mr. MOSES. It was the campaign for the nomination when it was raised.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I had reference to.

Mr. MOSES. Everyone knows that Col. Roosevelt was accused of being financed by men of great wealth, by "the interests," and it was charged that they expected to recoup themselves in the event of his success.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in my judgment the Senator is mistaken in the fact that the Senator from Idaho ever made any statement or was called upon to make any statement. I will say, however, that if Col. Roosevelt had been charged with it, in all probability I would have done so; but I was not fighting that part of his battle.

Mr. President, I am perfectly aware that the Senator from New Hampshire does not know anything about this matter, as he says; but there are people who do know about it. Mr. Proctor knows about it; Mr. Hitchcock knows about it; Mr. King knows about it; Mr. Doheny knows about it; Gen. Wood knows about it. Let us hear from those gentlemen who know.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. I wish the Senator from Idaho would say whether or not he is bringing a direct charge of complicity in an effort to corrupt the electorate against Gen. Wood.

Mr. BORAH. I say this, without any hesitancy—that the men who are managing Gen. Wood's campaign are proposing to control the Republican convention through the use of vast expenditures of money, and I waive my privilege here upon the floor when I say it. Why are they spending hundreds of thousands and which will run into millions except to control the convention?

Mr. MOSES. The friends of Gen. Leonard Wood intend to nominate him and elect him, and we shall not be balked by rhetoric.

Mr. BORAH. No; you can not be balked with rhetoric. If you used simply rhetoric, I would not object to it. It is the other thing that you are proposing to use that I am objecting to.

Mr. President, I feel so indignant about this matter that I do not hesitate to say that it is an intolerable outrage upon the American people, it is an insult to the intelligence of the American people, to claim that you have got to use hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars to control the convention of the Republican Party. Put the claims of your candidate forward with modesty, with decency, and risk the American people to form a wise judgment.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho further yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. Then, Mr. President, the entire body of the American people stand convicted, because it was necessary to spend millions of dollars to employ the columns of the newspapers, to placard every dead wall, to use flamboyant advertisements, and to cover the country with four-minute men and other orators in order to bring to the people of this country their privilege and duty to buy Liberty bonds; and such is the apathy of the public mind in this country that it is absolutely necessary to organize and carry on campaigns of publicity to advance the worthiest of causes, as we found out to our sorrow during the war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I acknowledge the necessity of publicity. I do not object to it at all. What I want is publicity. What I am pleading for is publicity. Let us know who the men are that are contributing to the nomination of the man whom the Senator from New Hampshire hopes to see the next President of the United States. Let us know who they are and what interests they represent.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, why pursue the matter? The Senator from Idaho and the New York World have settled it.

Mr. BORAH. Then I understand—and I am glad to have the admission—that the representative of Gen. Wood upon the floor of the Senate accepts the statements of the New York World and the Senator from Idaho as settling the proposition.

Mr. MOSES. No, Mr. President; I say that in their own minds they have settled it, and they are both as mistaken as they have been known to be heretofore.

Mr. BORAH. Well, if we are mistaken, let us have the facts which prove it.

Now, Mr. President, it seems that they not only propose to do this thing, but let us read the statement of Mr. Procter.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Idaho from what he is reading?

Mr. BORAH. I am reading from a statement made by Mr. Procter and published in the New York Sun. This was made after the publication by the World and after the statement by myself, and this is the only denial:

Gen. Wood is the candidate of the people and not of the politicians.

Everybody knows that Mr. Hitchcock is not a politician and that Mr. King is not a politician.

His campaign is being conducted by men who are not politicians.

I am inclined to agree that there are several in the camp who do not possess that qualification.

His campaign has been conducted solely on the lines of presenting a man of his character and his record to the American people.

And that is the denial of the specific charge that hundreds of thousands of dollars have been contributed by men of special interests and for special reasons. The Senator from New Hampshire makes the similar statement. After stating that he does not know how it was expended—which, of course, I believe to be true—he then says that it is all expended in a legitimate way. Let us have the facts before judgment is rendered upon this proposition.

Does the Senator know how much money Gen. Wood spent in South Dakota?

Mr. MOSES. I do not, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. Well, there is somebody who does know. Let the representatives of Gen. Wood state to the people of the United States how much money they put into South Dakota.

Mr. MOSES. Meaning by that that the treasurer of the campaign fund should tell what he spent, or that every friend of Gen. Wood who contributed a dollar in South Dakota shall be brought here and made to testify?

Mr. BORAH. The dollars were not contributed in South Dakota.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, I know of some.

Mr. BORAH. Well, perhaps a couple of dollars [laughter], but I am speaking now of the vast sums which were sent into South Dakota; and if you will do your country a service, you will have Mr. Hitchcock or Mr. King or Mr. Procter state how much money they sent into South Dakota, and then, in order that you may have company, call upon Mr. Lowden to state how much money he sent into South Dakota, and let us see how this campaign is being conducted in order to present the virtues of candidates for the Presidency.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the Senator invites me to a great public duty as he sees it; but I must say to him that I think I am engaged in a greater public duty in trying to elect Gen. Wood President of the United States.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, a moment ago I sent to the desk a bill which during the last Congress was introduced and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I now ask unanimous consent to introduce it out of order and ask to have it referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 4135) to revise, amend, and codify the laws relating to publicity of contributions and expenditures made for the purpose of influencing the nomination and election of candidates for the offices of Senator and Representative in the Congress of the United States, extending the same to candidates for nomination and election to the offices of President and Vice President of the United States, limiting the amount which may be expended, providing for the publicity of campaign expenses, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 103, beginning with line 17, to insert the following paragraph:

Prevention of spread of European corn borer: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the spread of the European corn borer, and to provide means for the control and prevention of spread of this insect throughout the United States, in cooperation with the States concerned, including employment of persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses, $500,000, of which $250,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. SMOOT. The last words of this amendment, "of which $250,000 shall be immediately available," cover one-half of the whole appropriation. That means that for the coming year there will be appropriated only $250,000, and the balance of this year, up to June 30, there will be an additional appropriation of $250,000. It seems to me, Mr. President, that that is not a fair distribution of the appropriation, if it is to be made.

The amendment also provides that this appropriation shall be expended in cooperation with the States concerned, including employment of persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere; but it does not say anything about whether the States are to pay one cent toward the work or not. I would like to know whether the States are going to pay as much money as is provided in the appropriation to be paid by the United States or whether this work is going to be carried on by the United States alone. The Senator having the bill in charge will know that appropriations for a particular purpose the States sometimes provide that the State shall put up dollar for dollar for the amount appropriated by the Government, and I would like to ask the Senator why there is no such provision here?

Mr. OVERMAN. Is there any provision that the Government shall decide how much the States are to put up?

Mr. SMOOT. There are such provisions.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish the Senator would show me such an instance. There are plenty of appropriations here where work has to be done in cooperation with the States, but I would like to see some provision along the line stated by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure I can show the Senator some.

Mr. OVERMAN. Where the Government provides how much the States shall put up? That is impossible to ascertain.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in all the appropriations that have been made for the enforcement of the Smith-Lever Act the State was to put up a dollar for every dollar appropriated by Congress. Not only that, Mr. President, but there are many appropriations made in the same way.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want the Senator to point me to any provision in this bill where such an appropriation is made. I think the Senator is correct that the State does put up dollar for dollar every time the Government puts it up; but show me anything like that in this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I think there are items like that in this bill, Mr. President.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask the chairman if there is any such item?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will permit me to say just a word, the Senator from Utah is correct in his statement as to the money appropriated for good roads, and also for the enforcement of the Smith-Lever law. But I hardly think there are any items in this bill—that is, there are no great amounts provided for in this bill——

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that is so, and I do not see how it could be done.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure there are items in this bill where that is provided for, Mr. President.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I will explain to the Senator from Utah why we did not require this. It was stated to the committee that some of the States had expended a much larger amount than was appropriated by Congress. I think the State of Massachusetts expended over $400,000 for this very purpose. The State of New Hampshire has expended large amounts. The State of New York has expended very large amounts for this particular work. I think I am safe in stating that for every dollar the Government has appropriated the States have contributed at least five. The Senator knows that it is mostly the Eastern States, the New England States, that are infested with this insect, the corn borer. There is an appropriation of $250,000 carried in the present law, and that was found to be entirely inadequate. The department has used $25,000 from another fund, so that $275,000 has been used. But I think I am safe in making the statement that a great deal more than a million dollars has been expended by these States which I have named.

There was a supplemental estimate sent to Congress as early as last summer, asking for a special bill to be passed through Congress, and we allowed $250,000. The department asked for $500,000 more.

I realize it is a large amount, but from the showing made, not only by those who represented the department but by people who live in these States, who are very much concerned about the destructiveness of this pest, we felt that we are fortunate that it has not extended to the West. When we consider that the corn crop of this country is nearly 3,000,000,000 bushels, worth $1.50 a bushel, $500,000 is a small amount to compare with it.

I would not be in favor of allowing a dollar that I thought would be wasted. I was in hopes we could get along with $250,000, but the members of the committee convinced me that we ought to have this amount—$500,000. I trust that the Senate will allow it to go to conference. It is a good deal like the expenditure for the eradication of the boll weevil and the bollworm. There is a serious condition confronting the American people. It may seem like a large expenditure, and, of course, it is a large expenditure; but it is nothing to compare with the value of the crop. We increase the amount for the eradication of the boll weevil and the bollworm to $600,000 in this bill, but I feel that every cent of it must remain in the bill, because every dollar and every penny of it will be needed to eradicate that destructive insect. So I trust that the Senator from Utah will permit this to go in. The Senator knows the reason why the House did not put in an appropriation for the eradication of the corn borer. It was believed it would be carried in another bill, and that was the only reason why it was not in the bill when it passed the House.

Mr. SMOOT. An appropriation of $250,000 has already been made for that purpose.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; this year, in this act.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I mean, for the current year. But the House did not provide for an appropriation in this bill. This has all been inserted by the Senate. But this amendment carries the $250,000 appropriation to be spent between now and June 30 of this year.

Mr. GRONNA. Oh, yes; that may be more than is absolutely necessary. But I will say to the Senator there will not be a dollar expended unless it is necessary to expend it. I am perfectly willing, if the Senator wants to reduce that amount, to have him offer an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. There are only three months left of this fiscal year.

Mr. GRONNA. Let me tell the Senator from Utah how this work is being done. The eradication of this pest is a good deal the same as the eradication of the boll weevil. Every straw and every root of the cornstalks must be pulled up, piled up, and burned, and the quicker you can do this work the greater the economy, and the more effective will be the protection. I am quite sure that if enough men could be secured in these States where they have this pest so as to commence the work right now, before the spring crop is put into the ground, there would be a great saving of money.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from North Dakota how this borer gets in his work. Does he bore, as the boll weevil does, into the pulp, or is it in the stalk or in the root of the corn?

Mr. GRONNA. It gets into every stalk and every fiber; and the way it attacks the corn is this: It goes through the husk, and it simply gets onto the corn and eats up every particle of the corn, and leaves only the column.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that the borer works himself into the pulp of the stalk and does his destructive work there, just the same, I will say to the Senator from North Carolina, as the worm does in the sugar cane in the Hawaiian Islands.

Now, Mr. President, it looks to me as if this is an unfair division. I am not objecting to the appropriation of money for this purpose. I recognize that this industry is important to the United States, more so than many other industries. But I want to say to the Senator that there was $250,000 appropriated last year. Nine months of the year for which the appropriation was made have passed. Grant that they have spent all of the $250,000, and there is only one-fourth of the year yet in which the work can be done. If that is the case, it seems to me that this $250,000 can not be profitably expended within the three months, unless they multiply the amount of work that has been done in the last nine months by four, and that I do not believe is necessary.

Mr. POMERENE. Allow me to suggest to the Senator, however, that they are getting right up to the planting season, and it is a question of the distribution of the seed and other materials, the fibers, which may have the corn borers in them, that leads to the spreading of the borer.

Mr. SMOOT. The corn borer is not found in the seed, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Perhaps I have not expressed myself as completely as I should have. As I understand, the corn borer has been largely brought over here with the shipment of broom corn and other things from Venice, Italy. I have a memorandum here from some of the experts on this subject, going into the matter very fully and very explicitly, and it is necessary to exercise the greatest care, otherwise this is going to become one of the most serious problems the country has ever had to deal with.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course that same thing will apply, then, to the next year.

Mr. POMERENE. That may be so.

Mr. SMOOT. And this is what this means, that they can spend this $250,000 from now until June 30, this year, then there will be only $250,000 left for the whole of next year, and it will mean that there will be an additional appropriation asked for.

Mr. POMERENE. It may be that it will be necessary for us to make additional appropriations. This corn-borer plague became most serious in Massachusetts, and, as I understand, Illinois quarantined against it for a time; but if the corn borer ever gets out into the great corn belt it will be a public calamity.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I was wondering why the Senator kept saying there was $250,000 that must be spent in the next three months.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say it must be spent, but it will be spent.

Mr. KENYON. How does the Senator know that?

Mr. SMOOT. They never would ask for the amount unless it was intended to spend it.

Mr. KENYON. It is in the nature of an insurance fund. If this matter gets started—it has not reached my State yet, and I hope it may not, because they are confining it to the East—the destruction by the corn borer will be beyond estimate. We have to rely, it seems to me, upon the honesty of the department that they will only spend what is necessary of this fund.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that I am not objecting to the $500,000 appropriation. That is not it at all; but it does seem to me that $250,000—50 per cent of the amount that was appropriated for the whole of the present year—is too much to expend within the last three months of the year in addition to what they have already spent.

Mr. KENYON. It is unless the necessity arises, and that we can not foretell.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think the explanation for it lies in the fact that the department intends to make an intensive drive during the next few weeks after the passage of this bill. As suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the corn borer lays an egg in the stalk of vegetable fiber of various sorts, and, so to speak, hibernates in the stalk not only of corn but of broom corn as well. It came to the country, as suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], in broom corn from Hungary, but it is not restricted to corn or broom corn. It affects practically all sorts of vegetable matter.

The few weeks following the passage of this bill will be the peak period in the effort to eradicate and arrest the spread of this pest.

I am sorry to say there is very little hope, if any, of the eradication of the corn borer. They have hoped to arrest its progress and even to restrain it to limited sections of Massachusetts. Of course, the Senator realizes that no expenditure will be too great to confine it to the territory at present occupied. Corn is more widely grown in the United States than any other field crop; the corn crop exceeds in value any other single crop, and to allow the corn borer to infest the corn belt would entail a loss beyond all calculation. This is one incident where certainly if we are to sin at all we ought to sin on the side of extravagance rather than on the side of too strict economy. I hope the Senator will not resist the appropriation.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this matter came up, as I recall, before the Agricultural Committee, and I think the objection of the Senator from Utah to it is because it provides $250,000 to be immediately available. I think the Senator's opposition is due to a want of understanding of the way this pest is fought. The necessity for the money being available in the next 90 days is for quarantine purposes, to prevent vegetables being shipped out of infested regions. The host of the pest is in vegetables. Forty-two varieties are known to be popular hosts of it, and there is no possibility of extermination. It is a question of the isolation of the pest, and unless these vegetables are kept within the infested district they will go out into new districts and the pest will be carried into them. In the spring months when vegetables are being taken from the garden from infested sections a most strict quarantine must be maintained, and this money must be available now and during this period if it is to be effective.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GORE. I wish to add a sentence to what I said a moment ago as to the method of campaign. The intensive method to which I referred is the burning or destruction of stalks and vegetable matter and weeds. These pests hibernate in weeds as well. It is to make a drive for the destruction of these borers that this money is to be used.

Mr. SMOOT. Whenever we see in an appropriation bill an amount that shall be made immediately available, it is generally to cover a deficiency, as I stated yesterday; and although this is not exactly that, it would be a deficiency before the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator from Utah what suggestion he has to make?

Mr. SMOOT. One-quarter of the amount appropriated would be $66,000, but I suggest to make it $150,000.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well, make it $150,000 and let it go to conference.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before that is done, with the permission of the Senator, I have a joint letter here from N. E. Shaw, secretary of agriculture; E. C. Cotton, chief of the bureau of horticulture; Herbert Osborn, professor of entomology, Ohio State University; and T. H. Parks, extension entomologist of the Ohio State University, and with reference to the corn borer they say:

> The complete elimination of all funds for the control or eradication of the European corn borer from the urgent deficiency bill is especially unfortunate. The funds for this purpose should be immediately available, not only for quarantine but especially for clean-up work. This latter must be done before the middle of May if done this year, and delay until next year will intensely complicate the problem and immensely increase the final cost of the control work, perhaps rendering eradication impossible. Delay at this time must result in continued spread of the pest until it eventually infests the entire country. With an annually recurring loss conservatively estimated to be at least 50 per cent of a $3,000,000,000 crop as the probable price we shall have to pay for delay in starting and vigorously prosecuting this work, it appears to be very poor economy to refuse any appropriation necessary to eradicate the pest, or at least hold it where it is.
> The amount asked for by the Secretary of Agriculture for this purpose is but a very small per cent of probable annual loss to the corn crop of the Nation if nothing is done until the pest becomes well established over the whole corn belt, which is likely to occur if nothing is done before May of this year.

Mr. SMOOT. That has reference to the estimate which was sent down for this purpose to be put on the deficiency bill.

Mr. POMERENE. I know. That was stricken out, but this goes to the subject.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that it did not. The letter confirms just exactly what I have stated. This work has to be done by the middle of May, which is but 50 days, and 50 days left with this amount would be $5,000 a day. They can not spend the money within that time; but if we make it available up until June 30 every dollar of the $250,000 will be spent in some way or other, and then for next year there will be but $250,000 in all. It can not be possible that they will spend within 45 days more than $150,000, and I think the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] ought to accept an amendment striking out $250,000 and making it $150,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me make this suggestion. This appropriation is for $500,000——

Mr. SMOOT. The amount of the appropriation is not changed at all.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand that; but we are trying to deal with a situation so as to give to the country the benefit of the work of these specialists before or during the month of May. The fund will be available for the next crop.

Mr. SMOOT. No; only up to June 30.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand; but we are making appropriation for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1920, so that a part of it would be available the following spring. I do not think we ought to cripple this department. Of course, I have no personal knowledge about the way in which they are going to do this work, but with all due respect I do not imagine any Senators have.

Mr. SMOOT. All the knowledge I have, I will say to the Senator, is through past experience and past knowledge that I have of appropriations made for any purpose.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize that there is very great force in what the Senators says, speaking generally of appropriations for the departments, but this is certainly a most important matter just at this particular time. We do not appreciate the value of the corn crop until it is gone. If this pest is spread over any particular part of the country, it is going to make it more difficult to control it. I have been told in the correspondence I have had that it has broken out in certain places in Illinois and in Ohio.

My information is very general on the subject, but I do know, from conversations I have had, that some of these men from Ohio who came down here feel that we can not overestimate the danger to the country.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to take any more of the time of the Senate to discuss it. I move to amend by striking out "$250,000" and inserting "$150,000."

Mr. KENYON. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The READING CLERK. The Senator from Utah proposes to amend, on page 103, line 24, by striking out "$250,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$150,000."

Mr. SMOOT. That only applies to that made immediately available.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POMERENE. I think Senators here are informed on this matter, but I have another letter from Prof. H. H. Gossard, who is entomologist at the Ohio Agricultural Experiment Station at Wooster, Ohio. There is one paragraph relating to this very subject on the corn borer which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> No appropriation at all is made in the committee schedules to prevent the spread of the European corn borer. I am told by a number of the best entomologists in the United States, including Dr. Herbert Osborn, of the Ohio State University, and Prof. E. C. Cotton, of the Ohio State department of agriculture, who have seen its work, that it destroys about 50 per cent of the value of the corn crop in Massachusetts and that it may reasonably be expected to do the same if it gets into Ohio. If it should prove to do only half as much harm as it seems certain that it will do, I believe Ohio Congressmen would feel like exerting themselves to the utmost to provide for retarding its spread as long as possible. It seems to me that an appropriation of several hundred thousands dollars should be forced into the appropriation bill to rectify this omission by the Agricultural Committee. Please pardon my calling this to your attention at this time, but I think you are not likely to obtain this information unless it is furnished by some of the men who keep in close touch with entomological developments. Can you not see an opportunity to render a real service to your State as well as the Nation by exerting yourself to have these appropriations conform to the request of the Secretary of Agriculture before the appropriation bill is voted on? I believe the European corn-borer item was cut from the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to ask, Was not this subject gone into by some other committee within the last year or two?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Ohio that what he has in mind is undoubtedly a joint committee, which was constituted exactly as the one provided for in this bill is proposed to be constituted, in pursuance of the Agricultural appropriation bill of 1915. That committee, however, was charged with the duty of investigating long-time rural credits, and I should like to give the Senator a brief history of the long-time rural credits system.

In 1913, following considerable agitation in this country and numerous bills introduced in both Houses from time to time, the Senate adopted an amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill of that year creating the United States rural credit commission. That commission was charged with the duty of visiting Europe and studying various long-time credits systems. The commission did go to Europe and made its report. Time passed, but nothing was done. In 1915—and I may say this to the credit of the Senate—the Senate adopted an amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill raising a joint committee of the two Houses, constituted exactly as the proposed new joint committee is to be constituted—in fact, the pending provision is copied from that—and placed that joint committee of the two Houses under mandatory instructions to report a long-time rural credits bill on or before January 1 following, which was January 1, 1916. That committee, being under mandatory instructions, reported a bill which afterwards became the present law and created the present system. That, however, as the Senator is well aware, relates to long-time rural credits. There is no system of short-time rural credits in this country, but a great deal of progress has been made in European countries in short-time rural credits as well as in long-time rural credits.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. POMERENE. Are not the two systems so interrelated that necessarily the study of one would have been involved in the study of the other?

Mr. GORE. To some extent the Senator is right about that, in a general way, although they are distinct systems, they have distinct institutions, and are based on distinct principles, of course. The objects to be served and to be accomplished are so entirely different that different and distinct systems are necessary.

During the last two or three years a successful system of short-time credits has been instituted in some of the Provinces of Canada; in fact, I have been in correspondence with the commissioner of agriculture of one of the Canadian Provinces recently, who advises me that the system is working admirably there. It is contributed to by the Province, the counties, and the municipalities, and is made to articulate with the existing banking system in the counties. It is not to supersede the banking system; it is not to conflict with it; it is not to interfere with it. The small rural credit organizations cooperate with the banks; the banks have taken an interest in the system and are helping them to fare, and they are faring prosperously.

Now, it seems to me that in this country it might be possible to work out a system that would articulate with our banking system and that might provide the farmers with a much-needed system of short-time credits. Of course, farmers need a longer credit than 90 days; their credit ought to run with the season, as they are in a seasonal business. Regular commercial banks can not provide them with the character of short-time credits which they need and require.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I think this is perhaps open to objection.

Mr. GORE. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. POMERENE. But I do not propose to make it. I had this thought upon the subject, that if the subject had already been gone into by a committee we ought not to duplicate the work.

Mr. GORE. No, sir; the committee did not report.

Mr. POMERENE. I think there is a very great opportunity here for some very beneficial legislation upon the subject, and if committees have not familiarized themselves with it I certainly have not the disposition to object to it.

Mr. GORE. The former joint committee did not report a bill on the subject of short-time rural credits.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am quite sure that we could not get a quorum or I would ask for a vote upon this item, as the House has not passed on it, but, as it is going into conference, I will let it go through. I desire, however, to express the hope that in conference the House will not agree to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 105, after line 19, to insert:

Officers and employees of the Department of Agriculture during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, while traveling on official business away from their designated posts of duty may be allowed not to exceed $6 per day for subsistence, but in no case shall they be reimbursed any sum in excess of expenses actually incurred by them.

Mr. SMOOT. I am going to ask the Senator in charge of the bill to allow the amendment just stated and the following item to go out of the bill. I do so because the allowance in lieu of subsistence for officers and employees of other Government departments is involved in these two proposed amendments. We can not give an increased allowance to employees of the Agricultural Department unless we also give it to the employees of the Interior Department, the Department of Labor, and all of the other departments. I wish to say to the Senator that the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which has been reported to the Senate and which is now upon the calendar, carries the usual $4 per diem in lieu of subsistence. There was not one of the officials of those departments who appeared before the committee who did not ask that the allowance be increased. The House refused to increase it beyond $4 and the Senate Committee on Appropriations has stood by the House in that matter. Now, if $6 is allowed to the employees of the Agricultural Department instead of $4, the Senators can see what an inconsistency there will be. Whatever the present law provides for in this respect I think we ought to adhere to it in all cases.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question for my own information. As I remember, this question came before the Appropriations Committee in connection with the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. It did.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not remember whether or not a change was made in that bill in respect to the allowance for subsistence.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator we left it just as the law is to-day, and therefore these amendments ought to go out.

Mr. GRONNA. Then I shall not insist upon the amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator from Utah that a rule should not be applied to the employees of the Agricultural Department that is not applied to the employees of the other departments, but what reason actuated the committee in refusing to increase the allowance in view of present circumstances and conditions in this country and the high cost of living?

Mr. SMOOT. In some instances the allowance in years past was increased from $3 to $4. In most places where Government employees are compelled to travel, particularly in the country towns, outside of the cities, it does not cost more than $4 a day for the employee to feed and lodge himself at a hotel. That is the reason the committee did not increase the allowance.

Mr. HARRISON. What if they are sent to some city? Does the Senator think they could live on $4 a day in a city?

Mr. SMOOT. Very few of them are sent to the cities.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, the larger sized towns.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that, in my opinion, the allowance now provided is sufficient in such a case.

Mr. HARRISON. I really do not understand how they can live—buy three meals a day and have a room—on the amount now provided.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not wish to go into this matter——

Mr. HARRISON. I do not care to get into any discussion regarding it; I agree that the same rule should be applied to all employees.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all I ask.

Mr. HARRISON. And I think it ought to be handled by the committee that has in charge all such matters. I was merely wondering the reason why an increase was not recommended generally.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, as this bill will be in conference for some time, will the Senator from Utah let the amendments go to conference with the understanding that if no similar increases are made in any of the other bills applying to the other departments, so far as I can I shall agree with the Senator not to insist upon a retention of the amendments?

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to state that the allowance in lieu of subsistence for travel in a foreign country is different from the amount allowed in this country. The amount allowed for subsistence for travel in Alaska is different from the amount allowed elsewhere in this country, and ought to be, as we all recognize; but I will say to the Senator that we allowed the subsistence item for the other departments to remain as provided in the present law.

Mr. GRONNA. And that covers all of the other departments?

Mr. SMOOT. It covers other departments. If the Senator wishes the amendment to go to conference with the understanding he has suggested, well and good, but I know that if the amendment is agreed to here and the other departments do not know of our understanding and agreement about it they will immediately think that they have been discriminated against.

Mr. GRONNA. As one member of the committee, I would not ask that we increase the allowance for subsistence for this particular department unless it is increased generally. There is a possibility, of course, that it may be increased all the way through, and if that should happen I thought it would be a precaution to let this amendment go in the bill and go to conference, with the understanding that if there is no increase in other cases we shall not insist on the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I am willing that it shall go to conference with that understanding, but there will be no increase in other instances unless such increase is brought about by amendment on the floor of the Senate while the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill is being considered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. In case of the Internal Revenue Service, for instance, the prohibition agents under the Internal Revenue Bureau, what is the amount they receive?

Mr. SMOOT. We have appropriated $21,000,000 for the Internal Revenue Bureau for the collection of taxes and other work imposed on that bureau, and most of the employees are paid from that lump-sum appropriation, and so I can not say what amount is allowed; but I know that out of that sum we have appropriated for specific purposes there are, I think, 42 employees who have been detailed to other departments. I am not going to repeat what I have said here so often, namely, that the lump-sum appropriation is a curse that leads to great extravagance. We have got to reach it in some way or other or we are never going to be able to economize in the expenditure of the public money.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment reported by the committee is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, at the top of page 106, to insert:

The Secretary of Agriculture during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, is authorized to prescribe per diem rates of allowance not exceeding $6 in lieu of subsistence to officers or employees of the Department of Agriculture engaged in field work or traveling on official business outside of the District of Columbia away from their designated posts of duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 106, after line 7, to insert:

Plant inspection and detention plant, Washington, D. C.: That so much of the appropriation of $50,000 made by the Agricultural appropriation act for the fiscal year 1920 for the purchase of not to exceed 50 acres of land near the city of Washington, D. C., and the erection thereon of all necessary buildings and equipment, and for the establishment of a plant inspection and detention station as remains unexpended at the close of the said fiscal year is hereby reappropriated and made available for expenditure during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, for the purposes named under the same conditions as prescribed in the said act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Chair may have the attention of the chairman of the committee, he desires to call attention to the language in line 8, where it says "detention plant," and the language in line 14, where it says "detention station." Ought not the expression to be the same in both instances; in other words, ought not the word "plant" be changed to "station" or vice versa?

Mr. GRONNA. That is correct, and I will ask that that change be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, in line 8, the word "plant," where it occurs the second time, will be changed to "station" and the amendment as amended will be agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 106, after line 18, to insert:

The Secretary of Agriculture is hereafter authorized to acquire by gift, devise, or by purchase for a sum not to exceed $1 for each site, the sites now occupied by field stations at Chico, Calif., consisting of about 80 acres and used for propagating, testing, and distributing new plant introductions; the site at Bellingham, Wash., consisting of about 60 acres and used as a bulb station and for propagating, testing, and distributing new crop plants; and the sites at Buena Vista, Fla., and Savannah, Ga., consisting of about 25 acres and about 46 acres, respectively, and used for propagating, testing, and distributing new crop plants peculiarly adapted to the warmer parts of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator if the lands enumerated in this amendment are now being operated by the Government?

Mr. GRONNA. They are. This provision is simply to permit the Agricultural Department to accept donations of land. I see that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is here, and as this is really his amendment I will ask him to explain it.

Mr. SMOOT. All I desire to ask the Senator from Washington is whether the lands enumerated in the amendment are now being cultivated, for the purposes named, by the Government?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I can speak from personal knowledge with reference to the lands at Bellingham. They are. They have been used for several years. For a while they were used under lease, and then the parties who owned the lands were perfectly willing to deed them to the Government of the United States, and a deed was actually made, accepted by the officers, and placed on record; but the Department of Justice has held that without an act of Congress the title would not pass. The Government got a lease for 30 years for a dollar, but it seems to me it is the wise thing for us to accept the title while the people who own the property are perfectly willing to donate it to the Government.

These lands at Bellingham have been used, as I say, for several years, and bulb propagation has been developed very greatly there and they have demonstrated that we can produce in that section of the country as fine bulbs as they produce in Holland. Some quite valuable buildings have been constructed on these lands; they have been cleared, leveled, cultivated, and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know whether there is a provision in the deed requiring the Government of the United States to cultivate the lands for the purposes named in this amendment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, I really do not know about that, but I am inclined to think there is a provision there that if they cease to be used for the purpose for which they are donated, they shall revert to the original owners.

With reference to the lands at these other points, I can say that I was told by a representative of the Agricultural Department that in the case of the plant in California they have accepted a deed there, and have been cultivating that land, and my impression is that that is being done at all three of those places; but I can speak from personal knowledge of the situation at Bellingham.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I wish to corroborate what the Senator from Washington has stated. The committee was informed that all this land at all these stations was being used by the Agricultural Department.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I wanted to know. Of course, I recognize the fact that if the Government continues cultivating the lands for the purposes named in the amendment, it will be a benefit to the communities in which the lands are located, and I take it for granted that that is the reason why the deeds are offered to the Government of the United States by way of gift, or at the nominal sum of $1.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say that the people at Bellingham who own the property are very public-spirited people. They do not get any benefit in the way of improvement to other lands, as I understand, and I know that these lands are quite valuable. Bellingham is a city of probably 25,000 or 30,000 people. These lands are within a couple of miles of the heart of the city, and are very valuable. I know that the people who own the lands are very public-spirited, and from their interest in the development of this industry they are glad to donate the lands to the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first amendment passed over.

The READING CLERK. The first amendment passed over will be found on page 9, beginning on line 13, passed over at the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am quite sure that when the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill is drawn to this amendment, he will ask that it be rejected.

The amendment reads:

And provided further, That the proviso contained in section 11 of the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, shall not prohibit the printing in the printing office of the Weather Bureau in the city of Washington of the maps, bulletins, circulars, forms, and other publications herein authorized.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, it may be that my notes are not correct, but with the consent of the Senator from Utah I should like to read what information I have:

For the entire period of its existence, the Weather Bureau has had authority of law for the maintenance of a printing office in Washington (28 Stat., 601, and previous acts).

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. GRONNA (reading)—

Section 11 of the legislative, executive, and judicial act for 1920, approved March 1, 1919 (Public, No. 314), had the effect of repealing this authority, because of the following provision therein:

Provided further—

This is the provision that is claimed to have repealed the original law:

Provided further, That on and after July 1, 1919, all printing, binding, and blank books for the Congress, the executive office, and the judiciary, and every executive department, independent office, and establishment of the Government, shall be done at the Government Printing Office, except such classes of work as shall be deemed by the Joint Committee on Printing to be urgently necessary to have done elsewhere than in the District of Columbia for the exclusive use of any field service outside of said District.

Mr. SMOOT. That covers the whole subject, and I will explain it to the Senate. It is under the act of June 30, 1920, placed upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, that the Joint Committee of the House and the Senate have stopped all of this useless printing on the part of the Government so far. I expect to sign the report as required under that law within a day or two, and I then want to present it to the Senate, calling attention to the millions of dollars that we have already saved.

Mr. President, the Joint Committee on Printing has not any idea of preventing the Weather Bureau in the city of Washington from printing maps and all of the other work that they have been doing in the past, with the single, solitary exception of the publications that they may be sending out of which they print more than 1,000 copies. Under the law, all that the Weather Bureau has to do is to make an application, like every other department of the Government, to the Joint Committee on Printing for the privilege of printing anything that it is absolutely necessary for them to print for distribution, and the Joint Committee on Printing has not made a single refusal where there was any shadow of reason for the requests made by the different departments.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. It was represented to the committee, as I recall, that the Weather Bureau had a printing press——

Mr. SMOOT. They have.

Mr. HARRISON. And that they were fully equipped to do this work, and that in the interest of economy they wanted to continue to do it and not be compelled to send to the Government Printing Office and have something done at an increased expense to the Government. That is the reason why the committee acted.

Mr. GRONNA. That is exactly as I understood it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that the Weather Bureau has already had an authorization from the Joint Committee on Printing to print, but under the printing law the departments were restricted from printing more than a thousand copies of certain publications. Why, Mr. President, they paid no more attention to that law than they did to the wind. They went on and printed sometimes 100,000 of them. There was no limit. We could not tell anything about it, nor what numbers they were going to print, costing hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars each year.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah whether there are any other departments of the Government except the Weather Bureau that have their own separate outfits for printing? Of course I am not talking about the Treasury Department or the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. SMOOT. I have a copy of my report here, and I want to get the exact number. The Joint Committee on Printing has investigated 287 printing plants which were maintained in the various branches of the Government service since the passage of this law.

Mr. HARRISON. So the law that was passed in 1919 was passed in order to curtail not only the Weather Bureau in its operation and printing, but all of them?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the object was, as far as possible, to consolidate all of the Government printing in the Government Printing Office. We have the overhead charges of that office, and we might just as well do the printing of the Government there, where it can be under one head, as to have 287 printing plants distributed all through the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. And under the present law, without this amendment being adopted, the Weather Bureau can utilize their printing press, but in certain instances they would have to make application to the Joint Committee on Printing?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. I will say that the Weather Bureau is the only department of the Government that really should have a printing press, outside of the Government Printing Office; and the reason of that is that the weather charts and the maps that are printed by the Weather Bureau should be under the immediate and direct charge of the bureau. It is very technical work, and they ought to have it, and nobody wants to deny it to them.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. As the Senator from Mississippi stated, the committee felt that there was certain printing which was absolutely necessary to be done at the Weather Bureau—that is, the weather maps. If the Senator from Utah will assure me that the Weather Bureau will have the privilege of printing the weather maps I, as one member of the committee, shall have no objection to this provision going out.

Mr. SMOOT. I will assure the Senator that they will, and not only that, but I am perfectly willing that they should have these maps printed here in Washington as far as that is concerned; but the trouble is that they have gone further and they have added the very words that the original law provided for, namely, "bulletins, circulars, forms, and other publications"; or, in other words, they want to be left entirely free to publish all of the other matter. The maps ought to be printed there and the Weather Bureau ought to run that printing press. I want to say to the Senator that I shall see that the Weather Bureau have the right to print all that they have been printing there, unless it be the number of publications; and then, if it is shown to the committee that there are more than a thousand wanted, I want to assure the Senator that the Joint Committee on Printing will never hesitate to grant that request.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought perhaps the reason why they asked for the printing of the bulletins and circulars was because they were operating this printing press, and they could do it more cheaply because of its being in operation.

Mr. SMOOT. All they have to do is to ask the Joint Committee on Printing and show them the necessity for it, and that is all there will be to it.

Mr. HARRISON. Then they can do it?

Mr. SMOOT. Then they can do it. But, Mr. President, if we allow a general amendment on this Agricultural appropriation bill, every department of the Government would want an amendment on some other bill to relieve them. In fact, I presume Senators here know that three or four times they have gotten in certain appropriation bills provisions very similar to this one. But whenever we yield, if it ever gets into a bill, it is going to cost the Government millions of dollars. I will show that to the Senate just as soon as I get my report ready.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is, on page 17, line 12, passed over at the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], after the word "owner" to insert a colon and the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That not to exceed $200,000 of the appropriation for the payment of indemnities, carried in the Agricultural act for 1920, may be used for administrative and operating expenses during said fiscal year.

Mr. GRONNA. The other day, Mr. President, when this matter was up, I did not make it as plain as I should have made it. I have here a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, which I will ask to have read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I think I have a letter to similar effect. Let it be read, and I will follow it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, March 24, 1920.

Hon. ASLE J. GRONNA,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture and Forestry,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR GRONNA: Referring to the discussion on the Agricultural appropriation bill in the Senate, which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 23, pages 4735 and 4736, in which it has been made to appear that a deficiency has been created in the appropriation for administrative and operating purposes in conection with the investigation and eradication of tuberculosis, I respectfully beg to say that no deficiency has been created, and it is not intended that there shall be.

The expenses chargeable to this fund for the eight months ending February 29, 1920, amount to $376,543.72, leaving a balance of $123,456.28 to carry on the work for the balance of the year. It is apparent that with this balance there is no deficiency; but, as many times explained, this sum will not permit the department to meet the increased demands from the States for this work. Unless the sum is increased, as proposed by both the House bill and in another way by the Senate committee, the bureau will simply be obliged to decrease the present rate of expenditure for salaries and traveling expenses of testing inspectors throughout the States in order to keep within the limit of the funds still available. The request for $200,000 of the amount provided for indemnities to increase the operating balance was made with the view of carrying on the work without the financial handicap under which it is laboring and in the manner in which the country expects it to be done, as evidenced by the cooperation of the various States.

Very truly, yours, E. T. MEREDITH, Secretary.

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary of Agriculture wrote me a similar letter. I think, after reading over the statement that I made yesterday, there is no discrepancy whatever between the statement made by the Secretary of Agriculture and that made by me, with the exception that I said if the present work were to go on they would spend this $200,000, and virtually it was a deficiency; and that is true.

The Secretary says that if the $200,000 is not given to him to spend between now and June 30, 1920, together with the $123,456.28, the balance still due from the fund, he will have to reduce the rate of expenditure for salaries and traveling expenses. That is all there is to it. The appropriation that was made last year is not enough to enable them to carry out the program that the Secretary of Agriculture has mapped out, and they want $200,000 more for that purpose. The indemnity fund has $200,000 and more in it, and the department wants to take the $200,000 from the indemnity fund and use it for the payment of salaries and traveling expenses of the employees of the department. That is the whole situation in a nutshell. Now, the question arises as to whether we had better tell the Secretary of Agriculture to use the $123,456.28 that is still due out of the appropriation that was made for the fiscal year ending June 30 of this year or give him $323,456.28.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if this $200,000 is given as asked for, then for the remaining three months of this fiscal year they will have nearly as much money to pay salaries and traveling expenses as they paid for all the nine months during the present fiscal year. I do not think that is right.

If $123,456 is not enough, how much do they want? They could not possibly ask for more than $100,000, because that would be two-thirds of all they have spent during the nine months, and so if we made it half it would be more than enough. I do not want to cripple the work, but that is not the question at all. I think they ought to have enough, and I am going to ask that the Senator having the bill in charge agree to strike out the $200,000 and insert $100,000, and that gives $223,456 to be spent for this purpose in three months.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood that the Senator was against the principle of transferring funds.

Mr. SMOOT. I am.

Mr. HARRISON. If it is wrong to transfer the $200,000, it would be wrong to transfer the $100,000; and the department say they need $200,000.

Mr. SMOOT. The principle is wrong. I do not think the department has said it needs $200,000 more.

Mr. HARRISON. That is what they stated before the committee, and that is what they stated in the letter which was read.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state that even on the showing in the letter it does not show they want $200,000.

Mr. HARRISON. The showing before the committee was that they wanted $200,000, and on that showing the committee gave them $200,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state again that in nine months they have used for this purpose $376,543.72. Are they going to use $323,000, nearly the same amount, in three months? It is not consistent, and it can not be defended. They do not claim that they are going to put on any more men, but they claim that if we allow them only $123,000 they will have to reduce the rate of expenditure for salaries and traveling expenses. That is what the Secretary's letter, which was just read from the desk, states, and I have an exact copy of the letter addressed to myself. Therefore, Mr. President, I think, as I said the other day, it is a wrong practice to transfer from one fund to another. But I am perfectly willing to take $100,000, under the circumstances, and let that go to conference.

Mr. GRONNA. I am so anxious to hurry along with this bill that, so far as I am personally concerned, I will be glad to accept the $100,000, if there is no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for a division on that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Now, the question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I rise to ask for information. All the committee amendments have not been disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All the committee amendments have not been disposed of. There are some 10 amendments yet undisposed of.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], is on page 18, lines 17, 18, and 19, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That of the sum thus appropriated $20,000 may be used for experiments in the breeding and maintenance of horses for military purposes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment proposed by the committee. The chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], is absent to-day, but some days ago he stated the purpose of this appropriation of $20,000. The Government of the United States has two stations, one in the Northeast, I think in Vermont, and the other in one of the Western States, either Colorado or Wyoming. At those stations they are undertaking to improve the breed of saddle horses for the use of the Army.

The supply of horses for Artillery is ample. They have had no trouble in keeping that up. But there has been great difficulty all the time in keeping up the supply of saddle horses for the Cavalry, a horse of a standard type, and one hardy enough to subserve the uses of the Cavalry. As the Senator from New York said here a few days ago, this is the only thing that is done for the horse. It is absolutely essential that the proper animal be bred and raised for Cavalry service, and to refuse this small appropriation of $20,000, which the House allowed, would simply mean that the two stations where these horses are being bred would have to be closed. I hope the Senate will retain the provision.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, this is not the first time that there has been a great deal of opposition to this provision; but the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] have made such splendid pleas for the horse, and the amount is so small, that, so far as I am personally concerned, I shall have no objection to disagreeing to the committee amendment, although some other member of the committee may oppose this course.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that here is an instance where, if we are moved by the proper ideas of economy, which ought to control us now and which everybody realizes ought to control Congress, an item of this kind ought to be stricken out. As far as I am concerned, I do not believe that the committee amendment ought to be disagreed to. Here is an item in the agricultural appropriation bill to breed saddle horses for the Army, and we are confronted with the fact that there are not enough horses for the officers in the Army, that this would make it very convenient for them to have them, and therefore we ought to let them have them.

It is true of every item, Mr. President, that there is somebody who wants it and somebody can give a good reason for it. If we are going to submit to the little things all the way through, we might just as well quit trying to economize. This is not a big item, it is true, but I do not believe the Government of the United States at present ought to spend money for the purpose of breeding saddle horses for officers in the Army. They need some saddle horses and will be able to get them probably without special breeding places. They will not ride quite as easily, perhaps they will not look quite as nice, but while the rest of us are struggling along trying to pay the debts of the United States the officers of the Army ought to be able to get along with common ponies.

It does not seem to me that this is one of the necessary items to go into the bill. It looks to me as though it is one of the things which we can get along without, inconvenient though it may be. Some officer may have to walk instead of ride, but in order to help out on the plan of economy that is necessary to keep our Government from bankruptcy he ought to be willing to do it. Walking is good. We have the roads improved.

For a year or two, until we get on our feet financially, we can get along without these finely bred animals, as nice and convenient as it would be to have them. I am not criticizing that, but unless we stop somewhere with items of this kind we will not get anywhere. We ought to eliminate everything that is not absolutely necessary now, and this is not necessary; at least I do not believe it is. I will not dispute that it is important, but even some of the necessities we have got to get along without. The great American people are struggling now to make both ends meet with the high cost of living proposition that confronts them. We are talking even now about issuing some more bonds, and probably we shall have to do it before we get through, and when we do the cost of living will go up higher than it is now.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator's plea, it seems to me, is on the ground of economy, but if we strike out this item we do not reduce the total appropriation a cent. The item is $282,820, $20,000 of which may be expended for this purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true, but it would reduce the expenditure of money for this particular purpose. The money will be used for a more necessary purpose, in my judgment. I will say to the Senator from South Dakota, if the $20,000 were put on the total sum, then, if we take it out here, we can strike $20,000 off the total, and thus save it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I hope that will not be done. If we allow the $20,000 for this purpose, then we must increase the total by $20,000, because the department estimated for an appropriation of $58,640 for experiments in poultry feeding and breeding, and we must not reduce that. That is a very important item. I hope the Senate will not be parsimonious about a few thousand dollars for that great industry. I will say that if the item is restored, the total must be increased by $20,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, if that is true the adoption of the amendment means a saving of $20,000 in the appropriation bill?

Mr. GRONNA. It does.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next amendment passed over.

Mr. GRONNA. Before we leave that, I hope that the Senate will increase the total there.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have already increased it $20,000.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senate committee struck out the provision for experiments for breeding and maintenance of horses for military purposes, and added that to the appropriation made for poultry. The proviso has now been restored, and it seems to me that we ought to increase the total amount $20,000; otherwise the appropriation for poultry will be as it came from the House.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I think what the Senator had in mind is the amendment on page 17, lines 17, 18, and 19. The Senate committee provision for $50,000 was voted on. The States Relations Service was taken out of the total of $731,160 and put in a separate item, but the $20,000 we have just voted on would not change the total at all.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, it would, because we increased the amount. I will read beginning with line 20:

That of the sum thus appropriated $25,000 may be used for experiments in poultry feeding and breeding.

The Senate increased it to $58,640.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the committee also increased the general appropriation from $269,180 to $282,820. That is to take care of the increase which was made here for experiments in poultry feeding and breeding.

Mr. GRONNA. This amount was for experimenting with the breeding of horses.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. That $20,000 has to be increased in the total?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think there is something forgotten about these horses for military purposes. We ought to have an item in here for saddles. It is very appropriate on an Agricultural appropriation bill, you know, to provide for the Army.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask what was done with the amendment on lines 17, 18, and 19, page 18?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRONNA. Then I ask to amend by restoring the word "further," in line 19 on page 18. I ask that that amendment of the committee be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next committee amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 26 the committee amendment in lines 4 and 5, at the end of line 3, after the numerals "$86,410," strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That not more than $7,500 of this sum be used for experiments in cottonseed interbreeding.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, that is where I moved an amendment to make it $111,000 instead of $86,410.

Mr. GRONNA. Is the Senator opposed to the language being stricken out?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am not opposed to it.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator from Texas that the department wants to have the language stricken out.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am not opposed to striking out that language if I can secure the additional amount in the body of the paragraph. I shall be glad if the Senator will let the matter go over until we can take up an additional amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. If the increase is not granted, then does the Senator want to have the proviso restored?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I would be glad to have the proviso restored then, because we would then have that much money for cottonseed interbreeding work. It is a very important work and one that has been productive of valuable results. The estimates of the department call for this additional $25,000, and this amount represents the third and last installment on a special project which began three years ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator give his attention to the Chair for just a moment? The Chair understands the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas amends the House text and is not an amendment to the committee amendment. Therefore it ought to go over until after all committee amendments are agreed to under the unanimous consent.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is true, but it is so intimately related to the committee amendment that I suggest both matters go over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to passing them over until after the other amendments are disposed of?

Mr. GRONNA. The House provision was a limitation upon the amount which could be expended for cottonseed interbreeding. The Senate struck out that language, and clearly that is a different proposition than to increase the total. As I understand the Senator from Texas, he wishes a further increase in the appropriation. It seems to me we ought to dispose of the committee amendment first.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the paragraph provides for work not only in the matter of cotton but as to corn and other crops introduced from tropical regions.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Texas misunderstands me. I have no objection to taking up his amendment just as soon as we dispose of the committee amendment. I have no objection to taking it up at this time, but let us dispose of the committee amendment first.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Very well; that will be satisfactory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The committee amendment, on page 26, beginning in line 3, after the numerals "$86,410," is to strike out the proviso, which reads:

Provided, That not more than $7,500 of this sum may be used for experiments in cottonseed interbreeding.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this is a limitation on an appropriation that could be expended for experimenting in cottonseed interbreeding. If the Senate is going to increase this amount, I still want that limitation on it, because if we increase it $25,000 it may be taken to mean that we are not only going to spend $75,000, but that the increase of $25,000 is for that purpose. I think $7,500 is ample for the purpose.

Mr. SHEPPARD. How does the Senator know that it is? What basis has the Senator for making his assertion? The Senator has not studied the estimates, has he, that were presented by the department?

Mr. SMOOT. Has the department estimated that the appropriation should be more than $7,500 for experiments in cottonseed interbreeding?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The department estimated that the amount should be $104,000 instead of $86,000.

Mr. SMOOT. For what purpose?

Mr. SHEPPARD. For a special cottonseed interbreeding project in my State. The proviso here refers to cottonseed interbreeding in general. I will admit that it is somewhat complicated, but that is the way the appropriation was divided.

Mr. SMOOT. Why should the Government of the United States spend $25,000 for experiments in cottonseed interbreeding in Texas and only spend in all the remainder of the United States $7,500, including Texas?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Because they got results in Texas that could be applied throughout the entire cotton belt. They have already spent two-thirds of the money which was originally estimated as necessary for that particular project. It will require only $25,000 more to complete that particular investigation. It is one which has been of great value in contributing to the knowledge on the subject of improved seed throughout the cotton belt. I am anxious to have the project completed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 26, after line 3, it is proposed to strike out the proviso as follows:

Provided, That not more than $7,500 of this sum may be used for experiments in cottonseed interbreeding.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, just a word. Let me say to the Senator from Texas that whether we increase the appropriation or not, this language ought to be stricken out. It is in the interest of the places where this work is being done that this limitation be removed, and I am sure the Senator from Texas will not oppose it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that my amendment be now considered, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was a unanimous-consent agreement that no amendments offered on the floor should be considered until after the committee amendments were disposed of, and it would be a violation of that unanimous-consent agreement should the Senator now offer his amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, I do not wish to violate a unanimous-consent agreement, and I know the Chair is correct in his statement. I will say to the Senator from Texas, however, that I think it will be only a matter of a very short time until we shall have disposed of the committee amendments, and the Senator can then offer his amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Very well; I shall wait.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next committee amendment passed over will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next committee amendment passed over, at the instance of Mr. SHEPPARD, was, on page 27, line 6, to strike out "$212,505" and to insert "$359,705."

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I move that the amount be increased by the sum of $80,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Texas mean an increase of $80,000 over and above the amount which the committee has reported of $359,705?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I propose to increase that sum by $80,000, I say to the Senator, and I shall give the Senator the views of the department on the subject in a minute. I propose to increase the amount of the appropriation from $359,705 to $439,705.

The department has the following to say regarding this matter:

The department in its estimates requested an increase in the cereal item from $452,505 to $524,705, an apparent increase of $72,200, but, taking into consideration transfers to the statutory roll, the actual increase amounted to $85,000, of which $35,000 was desired for investigations in the culture and breeding of cereals and $50,000 for investigations in the control of wheat scab or blight. The reasons for these increases are set forth in the House committee print of the estimates and in the hearings before the House committee.

Not only were these additional funds denied, but the House committee actually decreased the present appropriation by $80,000, including a reduction of $41,200 in the proviso for the investigation and control of cereal rusts. In the House the total was further reduced $147,200 through the elimination on a point of order of the proviso for the location and destruction of barberry bushes and other vegetation from which rust spores originate. In the bill reported by the Senate committee the barberry proviso, carrying $147,200, has been restored, but the item still lacks $80,000 of the total carried for cereal investigations in the current appropriation act.

A cut of $80,000 in the appropriation for cereal investigations will seriously affect the work now in progress if the bill is passed without the restoration of this $80,000, as indicated below:

I have laid before the chairman of the committee certain data in this regard. I do not know whether he has had as yet an opportunity to examine them.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I will say to the Senator I am familiar with those data. It is true, as the Senator states, that there has been a decrease of $165,000 below the department's first estimate, and the Senator now proposes to increase the amount allowed by $80,000.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am only asking that the $80,000 be restored. Then the department will have the equivalent of its current funds for these items.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that the action taken by the Senate committee does not decrease the total appropriation. The Senate committee added $147,200 for the eradication of the barberry bush to the amount allowed by the other House. I think it is an important item, so far as that is concerned, but there are very many things in the bill which are important, and the committee tried its very best to economize wherever it was possible to do so.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The department has this also to say on the subject:

To bring the work within the reduced appropriation carried by the bill as now drawn, it will be necessary to discontinue the experiments and investigations at present conducted independently or cooperatively at the following field stations: Akron, Colo.; Burns, Oreg.; Highmore, S. Dak.; Knoxville and Jackson, Tenn.; Amarillo, Tex.; Nephi, Utah; and Lind, Wash. It will be necessary also to reduce the extent of the work on some of the other field stations, including those devoted wholly to rice investigations at Crowley, La., and Biggs, Calif.

I ask the Senator from North Dakota if he will not let this apparent increase of $80,000 be adopted now and go to conference, where the matter can be more thoroughly worked out?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that I shall be very glad to have a vote taken on the amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I hope the Senate will adopt the course which I have suggested in the matter, because if the appropriation of $80,000 is not restored there is some very important work in a number of States which will have to be discontinued.

Mr. GRONNA. If the other members of the Agricultural Committee do not object to the amendment of the Senator from Texas, I shall offer no objection to it, but shall let it go to conference. I will not promise the Senator, however, that we can keep it in the bill.

In connection with that statement, I wish to say that during the few years I have been here it has been customary for the chairmen of different committees to announce on the floor of the Senate whether or not they intended in conference to insist upon appropriations inserted in bills by way of amendment on the floor of the Senate. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] this morning seemed to take issue with a statement made by me on yesterday, and I merely say this much now so as to make my position clear: The Senator from North Dakota has no intention, of course, to disregard the wishes of the Senate, but when a committee, consisting of 16 or 17 members, has recommended a certain provision and then some other provision is adopted in lieu thereof, with only 17 Members on the floor voting, it seems to me that the chairman is justified in making such a statement as was made by me on yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas to the amendment reported by the committee will be stated,

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 27, line 7, proposing to strike out "$212,505" and to insert "$359,705," Mr. SHEPPARD moves to amend by adding $80,000, which will make the total $439,705.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas to the amendment reported by the committee. By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHEPPARD. What was the action of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote was a tie, and the amendment therefore was not agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I was under the impression that the chairman of the committee said he was willing to have the amendment go to conference.

Mr. GRONNA. I said that, so far as I was personally concerned, if the other members of the committee were not opposed to it, I should have no objection to the amendment going to conference, but I could not promise to retain it in the bill. I think that was the statement I made.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to reserve a vote on the amendment to the amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 27, line 9, after the words "stripe rust," it is proposed to strike out the semicolon, insert a colon, and the following proviso:

Provided also, That $147,200 shall be set aside for the location of and destruction of the barberry bushes and other vegetation from which such rust spores originate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote whereby the committee amendment, on page 28, line 13, increasing the amount there appropriated to $159,000 was there agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment on line 13, page 28, was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. KENDRICK. I now move to amend by striking out "$159,000" and inserting "$169,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from Wyoming state for what purpose the additional $10,000 is desired?

Mr. KENDRICK. I shall be very glad to do so in a brief way. The stations provided for in this item are pioneer stations and in the highest sense are serving a useful purpose in the frontier communities in which they are located. Their work, of course, is largely experimental, but on a small scale they are gathering information in regard to crops which may be grown in that climate and in that altitude which heretofore has required experiments on a large and wasteful scale.

I have had the opportunity personally of seeing the workings of two of these stations, and I know that they are conducted in a very economical and sensible manner and that the demonstrations furnished to the farmers of the community are very practical and effective. They grow different varieties of cereals and forage crops in our north plains section. As indicating the results that are obtained from such demonstrations, I wish to refer to the introduction into the southwest portion of the country of kafir corn and milo maize. As a matter of fact, that territory was used, and is used now, largely as a stock-growing region. In spite of the fact that it was a wonderful pasture country it was never really successful in stock growing because of the impossibility of finding winter feed. These two plants, milo maize and kafir corn, were brought into the country and have not only revolutionized the live-stock industry of that country but have made it possible to populate the country very much more thickly; and I dare say that as a result of the introduction here of those grain and forage crops the increased production in that territory, embracing western Kansas, western Oklahoma, eastern New Mexico, and northern Texas—an enormous empire of country—is equal in value to the amount this entire Agricultural bill carries for the year.

These demonstration farms in the North are doing for their separate localities exactly what was done in that southwestern country, and this is a small item. It is an increase of $10,000 over what the department had last year, and is, as I understand, absolutely essential in order to keep all of the stations going.

I hope the amendment providing for the increase may be adopted.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, it is true, as the Senator from Wyoming has stated, that the estimate was more than the House allowed, and it was more than the Senate allowed. It is also true that this is very important work. There are now, I think, some 24 plant stations.

Since the Senate committee took action upon this bill I have received a letter in regard to the subject, and the Secretary states that it would really cripple the work that is being done in the semiarid regions of the West. I shall therefore say that so far as I am personally concerned I have no objection to the Senator's amendment. I believe it ought to be increased the extra $10,000. It will go to conference anyway, because the House allowed only $150,000, the Senate increased it to $159,000, and if the Senate adopts the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming, who is a member of the committee, it will be $169,000; and I trust that it will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over will be found on page 31, passed over at the instance of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], where the committee proposes to strike out the item for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not want to take up the time of the Senate on this item. This is the appropriation that is carried in the bill for the free distribution of seeds. Each Senator is familiar with it and knows whether or not he wants to vote for it. It was carried in the House bill. It provides an appropriation of $239,416. I am in favor of the item myself; I think it ought to be increased; and I ask for a vote on the adoption of the Senate amendment striking it out.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, before that is done I should like to have read a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that I have succeeded in securing the adoption of this item ever since I have been here by voting against it. I intend to vote against this one, and I have no doubt it will be carried.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if I may say just another word, I believe that the amendment proposed by the Senate committee to strike out the free-seed item ought to be adopted. The Senator from New York and I made a calculation yesterday morning as to what this costs the Government of the United States, and $240,000 is not what it is costing the Government. I am quite sure that no Senator will contend that a package of seed can be sent through the mails for less than 1 cent, and if it costs 1 cent to send these seeds through the mails, it costs for transportation alone $10,000,000 and more. I think it is indefensible.

I certainly would be the last one to cripple the agricultural industry. I might do it through being mistaken, but I would rather have the Department of Agriculture provided with funds to do research work, and give that information to the farmer, than to provide for the distribution of a few packages of garden seeds.

I ask that the letter which I send to the desk be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, March 1, 1920.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture and Forestry,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR GRONNA: In view of the effort which the Congress is making to economize in expenditures without seriously crippling the constructive work of the department, I beg leave to call your attention to a feature of the pending appropriation bill, which, in my judgment, could be dispensed with without material detriment to the agriculture of the country. This is the provision for "Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds," commonly known as the "Congressional seed distribution," for which the bill as it passed the House carried an appropriation of $239,416.

This activity has been maintained for many years along essentially the same lines as authorized in the present bill, the appropriation for this purpose for the current fiscal year being $358,980. Under this appropriation the department either purchases direct, or contracts for the growth of, seed of standard, tested varieties of vegetables and annual flowering plants adapted to growth in the several distinctive climatic regions of the country.

I understand that this distribution, which, in its inception, was intended definitely to be constructive and experimental in character by making possible the widespread introduction and testing of promising new varieties of useful plants, has for the past 35 or 40 years consisted of old, standard, and thoroughly tested varieties, the value of which for cultivation has long been determined and generally recognized. It is manifest, however, that, in view of the very great advance made in agriculture through the work of the State agricultural colleges and experiment stations and the Federal department in recent years, such need for a distribution of this character as may have existed in the early period of its development has ceased. I would, therefore, respectfully suggest and strongly urge that the Congress thoroughly consider the advisability of terminating this activity and of using the funds thereby released for the prosecution of urgently important investigational work on problems of crop production, which will be seriously crippled if the bill as it now stands becomes law.

In this connection, attention should be called to the fundamentally important investigations in foreign seed and plant introduction by the Bureau of Plant Industry, through which the best and most promising seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries are being studied, secured, propagated, and placed with the State experiment stations and private individuals for testing with reference to their value for introduction and cultivation in this country. The continuation and reasonable enlargement of this work is of peculiar importance at this juncture because of the quarantine restrictions which it has been found necessary to lay against the commercial introduction of plant material from foreign countries to prevent the introduction of additional destructive insects and plant diseases into this country.

I would also call attention to the work which the department is doing in the systematic purchase and distribution of new and rare field-crop seeds, particularly of grasses, alfalfa, clover, and other forage crops, through which the more promising, hardy, drought-resistant, and otherwise desirable forage crops are being placed with individual farmers in quantities sufficient for practical field tests to determine their adaptability to the different soil and climatic conditions of the important agricultural regions of the country. This is a constructive and useful work, which should be continued.

I am convinced that it would be highly desirable to make provision for the work of the Bureau of Plant Industry, and of the other branches of the department, at least to the extent suggested in the detailed memoranda recently transmitted to the Senate committee. I sincerely hope that the committee will give these memoranda careful consideration and that it will adopt the department's recommendation in each case.

Very truly, yours,

E. T. MEREDITH, Secretary.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, year by year I have consistently voted against this hoary-headed old fraud that creeps into the Agricultural bill. It usually goes out in the Senate, and then it goes to conference and marches in here again, out of the conference, with a smile upon its face. It seems impossible to end it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator makes a statement that does not correspond to my recollection. I do not recall that the Senate has ever been able, on the final vote, to strike out this item.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator is mistaken. We have stricken it out at least twice.

Mr. THOMAS. I am glad to know it, because that is an instance where my vote in favor of reducing appropriations at least corresponded to the majority vote of the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator's vote amounted to nothing, however, because when the item got into conference it was used for trading purposes, and the other branch of the Congress—which we can not refer to on the floor, apparently—was willing to give anything that the Senate wanted if it could get the free seeds.

We have these speeches on the floor every time the matter comes up, about the great benefit of these free seeds; and I have heard eloquent descriptions here of the mountain side, and the little bit of a farm, and the farmer's daughter with a little sunbonnet on her head, and a watering can in one hand to water the seeds and a flag in the other, thanking God for the beneficence of this wonderful Government. I wish I had the language of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] to describe it. Words fail me to properly depict this worthless custom.

I do not believe there is anything that has held up the American Congress to so much ridicule and contempt as this free-seed item. We can all go back to the days when we were boys and remember the little package that came with a Representative's name or a Senator's name up in the corner, and we gathered around the table at night under the little green lamp and held this up and said, "The great beneficence of our Congressman is wonderful; God bless our Representatives and Senators. They are sending out these wonderful seeds to us." And then we planted them and waited for them to grow—from radish seeds came onions; from carrot seeds, parsley.

It seems to me this now is a test of whether in the things that relate to Congress and affect Congress itself, it is willing to practice any economy. Of course, seeds do not buy votes, but they are used as a cheap means of introduction to make the average voter think that his Member of Congress is doing some tremendous work for him. It is time to quit it. I think the committee was unanimous in excluding this item. I hope the conferees will not permit this item to go back in this bill, and that they will stand there and let the bill be defeated, if necessary, and let the American people know that the little, cheap scheme involving garden seeds to send out and deceive the people is a thing that is not going to be passed by the American Congress. They do not grow, anyhow. I have planted them in my day, and I know you can raise but little out of them. I am glad the Secretary of Agriculture has recommended the abolition of this item. It will save the amount of this appropriation, something like $240,000, and besides save a million dollars in cost of transportation. Here is a real chance to practice some economy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over will be found on page 37. The proviso reads:

Provided, That the cost of any building erected shall not exceed $1,000.

It is proposed by the committee to insert the words "or improved" after the word "erected," in line 5.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move that after the word "or" there be inserted the word "as," so that the amendment will read "or as improved." That will cover the objection to which I called attention the other day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on line 5, insert between the words "or" and "improved" the word "as," so that it will read "or as improved."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 47, beginning with line 7, the paragraph beginning "For investigations of methods for wood distillation," was passed over at the instance of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. GRONNA. As I understand, there is no further amendment to be made, and I ask that a vote be taken upon the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the committee amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The committee proposes, on page 47, line 16, to strike out "$173,260" and to insert in lieu thereof "$223,260," so as to make the paragraph read:

For investigations of methods for wood distillation and for the preservative treatment of timber, for timber testing, and the testing of such woods as may require test to ascertain if they be suitable for making paper, for investigations and tests within the United States of foreign woods of commercial importance to industries in the United States, and for other investigations and experiments to promote economy in the use of forest products, and for commercial demonstrations of improved methods or processes, in cooperation with individuals and companies, $223,260.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is to be found on page 58, at the foot of the page, where the committee proposes to strike out certain lines in the House text, as follows:

For the investigation of soils, in cooperation with other branches of the Department of Agriculture, other departments of the Government, State agricultural experiment stations, and other State institutions, and for indicating upon maps and plats, by coloring or otherwise, the results of such investigations, $178,900.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I really do not know what reason the committee advanced for striking out this item of $178,900 for soil survey. It has been the policy of the department year by year to appropriate a like amount for this work. I think there are now about 30 States in the Union which are cooperating in this soil-survey work, and by failing to make this appropriation at this time we will cripple a branch of the work of the Agricultural Department that is rendering a great service to the people of the country.

I have much data here touching this work. I shall not take up the time of the Senate in reading it, but I do say to the Senate that if this committee amendment is adopted, striking out the appropriation for soil survey, I shall get a record vote on the proposition.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be agreed to. I think one of the most valuable things we have in this department is the making of maps of these counties, showing the farmers what kind of lands they have and what is in them. I gather from what the Senator in charge of the bill said the other day that it is in the interest of economy that it is proposed to be stricken out, because it is expected in the future that other appropriations would have to be made to go along with it. That is false economy, because if you strike out this appropriation you disorganize the whole bureau; you take the splendid young men, equipped and experienced in making these maps, and throw them out of the department, and they will go into some other business, and when you reorganize it you will have to employ new men and inexperienced men. So it seems to me it is false economy.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator having charge of the bill how long this appropriation has appeared in annual appropriation bills?

Mr. GRONNA. For a great many years. Of course, I do not minimize the work that is being done. The Senator is familiar with the work, of course. It is the making of plats and maps.

Mr. THOMAS. As it has been a feature of agricultural appropriation bills for a great many years, is it not fair to assume that the work has been practically completed?

Mr. GRONNA. I should think so.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know, except in a general way, much about the subject, but there are provisions found in the bill upon the same page that seem to me to be far more important than this one. If I am correct in assuming that this is an old, established part of the work, of course, the investigations of soils and the making of maps should not be duplicated. Where a county in a particular State has been investigated, and the maps have been made in accordance with the statute, it certainly would be false economy to duplicate that work. I do not know how well founded the rumor is, but I have heard that much of this work is being done twice, or perhaps more than twice. That, of course, is waste. But it seems to me that the provisions from line 7, on page 58, down to and including line 6, on page 59, contain ample appropriations and specify ample bases for their expenditure; so that if we can save this amount of money it ought to be done.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator. The Senate committee increased the total for the Bureau of Soils from $286,575 to $364,615, leaving this $178,900 out. I am quite sure that it is possible to delay this work without doing any damage to the agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if you delay this work, will you not drive out from this bureau everybody connected with it, and will you not disorganize the bureau entirely, and will not the men who are experienced, young men who have been at work there, be driven out of employment; and if you begin again, as you say you expect to do, will you not have untrained men, and have to have new men in the business, when you have the experienced men now who know how to take these soils and make these maps?

Mr. GRONNA. It is not difficult work, and if it is done in cooperation with the State colleges of agriculture, there will be no difficulty in having this work done, even if the appropriation is not made for a year or two years.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I do not know about other States, but in Missouri two-thirds of the farm lands have been mapped in connection with the condition of its soil. That would have been impossible without this Bureau of Soils in the Agricultural Department, and to discontinue it, after it has been running some years, just before the survey has been completed, would be, it seems to me, most extravagant. The advantage of the combination of the Federal Bureau of Soils with the State bureaus of soils is that the soils are mapped and chemically explained upon a basis that is similar everywhere, and it is invaluable to the Government. I can not see, having entered upon this work for so many years, how there can be any economy in discontinuing it for a time, because, as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] so well said a moment ago, to resume it would be doubly extravagant. It is invaluable in my State.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think it was at my instance, perhaps, that this amendment was passed over.

My attention was first called to the subject by the State agronomist of South Dakota, who occupies that position and is also superintendent of substations, and I may be indulged while I read a short extract from his letter of March 16. He says:

> In my opinion, the Federal soil survey as now conducted is a good example of how a nation-wide work can be coordinated in a truly cooperative way. I can not conceive what interests would be so short-sighted as to want to dispense with this work, dealing as it does with the conservation and development of our fundamental national resources. Can you not arrange to have this item replaced in the Agriculture appropriation bill by consulting with the Senate committee or otherwise?

Upon the receipt of that letter I called up by phone the Director of the Bureau of Soils, and he sent me a letter, from which I take the liberty of quoting briefly. I shall not read the entire letter. He says:

> The fundamental importance of the work is generally recognized. Many of the States have entered into cooperative agreements with the department and are matching Federal expenditures practically dollar for dollar, some of the State appropriations being contingent upon the prosecution of the work in cooperation with this department.

I will say, Mr. President, in passing, that the State of South Dakota appropriates $10,000 every year for soil survey work in cooperation with the work carried on by the Federal Government. He says further:

> The States are using the results as a practical basis for intelligent field operations and for scientific experimentation. The work is strongly supported by the State experiment station officials, and the reports issued by the bureau are used by farmers, prospective purchasers, real estate agents, railroads, bankers, life insurance companies, and other financial concerns. A discontinuance of this appropriation will necessitate the complete suspension of the soil survey work on June 30 and the disorganization of the highly trained and well-organized scientific force. It will be difficult to estimate the loss that will be sustained by the Government and the disorganization not only of the Government work but of all State work, as the States are all working under the leadership and through the cooperation of this department.

I had my attention called long before I took the matter up with our State agronomist and with the chief of the Bureau of Soils, and I am satisfied, Mr. President, that this is a most valuable and helpful work in the interest of the farmers. They know through this work of the ingredients that enter into the soil, to what crops the soil is best adapted, and so on. It is a great benefit, and I hope that the committee amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] was laboring under a misapprehension when he said that this appropriation was for the same purpose as other appropriations on the following pages of the bill. The appropriation of $15,000 on page 59 is for the "examination of soils to aid in the classification of agricultural lands in cooperation with other bureaus of the department and other departments of the Government."

That, Mr. President, is done in a wholesale way, or, in other words, public lands in general, and is to cooperate with the Geological Survey in classifying those lands, as to what class of lands they really are—whether they are semiarid lands or irrigable lands or grazing lands, or whether they are lands falling under the 640-acre homestead law or the 320-acre homestead law.

That is what may be termed a wholesale investigation or examination, but the investigation of soil, as provided for in the amendment which the Senate committee struck out for soil survey, may be termed a local investigation. In other words, here is a farm the owner of which asks the agricultural department of his State to make a soil survey, with a view of learning just what the ground is best adapted for in raising farm products. That involves a chemical analysis of the land. I have seen upon 20 acres of land in my home State 20 holes dug, and the soil from those 20 holes analyzed, showing exactly the chemical properties of the land. Upon those examinations are based the reports that may be given to the farmer, the owner of the land, or to the community in general as to what crops the land is best adapted to raise.

It seems to me if we are going to make any kind of an appropriation for soil surveys that will reach the farmer direct, it is this appropriation that will accomplish it. I would rather cut out of this bill half a million dollars in other places than to cut this appropriation out. There would be less harm done by it.

The only question to decide is, Are we going to do away with the soil survey? There is no need of doing away with it for the coming year unless we continue to do away with it, because if it is done away with this year the organization will be completely disorganized. So when we vote upon this proposition we must vote upon it with the idea that if this appropriation goes out the soil survey, so far as the Government of the United States is concerned, ceases on June 30, 1920, because we need not make any further appropriation for this purpose if we undertake to make no appropriation now.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be defeated. I have not only talked with specialists on this subject but I have had a number of letters from them. Everyone I have come in contact with favors this appropriation. I do not know of any specialist who is against it. I do not think that Senators, unless they have had occasion to investigate the subject, realize the importance of it.

I happen to have before me a pamphlet containing the soil survey of my own county—Stark County, Ohio. This survey was made by the United States Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Soils, in cooperation with the Ohio agricultural experiment station, of which Mr. Charles E. Thorne is director and John N. Harper is in charge of soil work. Other specialists represented the Federal Government. I know this has been a source of a great deal of value and a great deal of gratification to farmers of my own county. Stark County is one of two or three of the leading agricultural counties in the State, but if it is of value to the farmers of that county it is of value to the farmers of every other county. They have no way of getting this special information, unless they go to extraordinary expense, if the Governments, Federal and State, are not going to aid them.

I want to make the agricultural life of this country just as pleasant and just as profitable as we reasonably can make it, and this is one way by which we can aid the agriculturists, because it is not only to their own immediate financial interest but it is to the benefit of the entire consuming public.

For these reasons, very briefly stated, I hope the Senate committee amendment will be disagreed to.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I do not remember the reasons why the committee struck this amendment from the bill, and I do not remember whether in the committee I voted for that or not, but if I did vote to strike it out, I am satisfied now it was a mistake. I believe this item ought to remain in the bill.

There is a fundamental reason that is controlling me in the matter, and I think if Senators would read an article in Collier's Weekly of this week, with relation to the subject of soil and its relation to the prosperity of the Nation, they would at least commence to think about the necessity of our conserving the soil of our country. This article goes on to say:

> The most vital thing in our lives is three meals a day.
> The most vital thing in a nation's life is food.
> The producer of food is the soil.

Further:

> We are facing an agricultural problem in the United States just as sure as sunrise.

Then the article goes on in a rather interesting way to discuss the planks that have been offered for the political platform of the Republican Party in the New York Tribune contest. There have been over 2,000 planks suggested on foreign relations, Americanization, labor and capital, social legislation, Bolshevism, cost of living, budgets, free speech, Mexico, women voters, tariff, control of big business, prohibition, negro problem, and so forth, but nothing has been suggested as to the great basic proposition that this article speaks of as to the soil of America and its conservation.

We have been mining the land of this country instead of farming it. You can not go on year by year taking from the soil 40 or 50 bushels of corn per acre and returning nothing to the soil. If the day ever comes when the fertility of our soil is destroyed, then we are going to face a national and a world famine. The question of production to-day is the most important question before the American people and before the world, and it all comes back to this question of soil conservation and more work. No one can live except by the things that come from the soil. As a Government we ought to do our part in cooperation with the States to conserve the fertility of our soil. It is a basic proposition.

I believe this estimate, with the force the Department of Agriculture now have, will be helpful along that line, and I think we could well afford to cut other parts of the bill more than we could to cut this. Hence, feeling that way about it, I do not feel bound to support the amendment of the committee, and I shall vote to reject it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am glad that this amendment has made some of the farmers, among them Collier's Weekly, sit up and study farm conditions. I do not suppose there is a Senator here who does not know, as I know, just what this money is used for. The money is used for the Soil Survey to cooperate with the agricultural colleges of the States to take a certain section of a State and to make a soil survey, and maps are then prepared showing the conditions of the soil. If there are any farmers in my State who have ever asked me for one of those maps, I have not heard of them. They have never asked me to send them any of the maps.

What does the real farmer who produces cereals or other crops care about these maps? It seems to me it is an insult to a farmer's intelligence to say that the farmer does not know the soil in his own farm. You may have such farmers in the sections of the country where some Senators live, but I want to assure you that they know in the western part of the country.

I knew that this item would bring out a tremendous propaganda. Every agricultural college throughout the United States is interested in the item. Some of the professors of agricultural colleges in my own State, splendid men, have protested most vigorously against the action of the Senate committee. I am sure the item will go back into the bill, not because of the good it will do to the farmer—and I will challenge any Senator here or elsewhere to successfully prove that it does good—but just because of the propaganda that is going on.

I think I might be pardoned for saying that I spend more money than the average man throughout the United States in experimenting with soils and with crops, and I spend it out of my own pocket. I can tell you where these maps go if you want to know, but you do not know it. These maps go to real estate agents and to people who are anxious to sell land. That is where they go. Did any Senator here ever have a request for a soil-survey map? If so, I would like to hear of it. I never have had one.

Mr. POMERENE. I have had quite a number of requests for these soil surveys.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very glad if the Senator has had them.

Mr. POMERENE. I want to say, with due deference to what the Senator says, that the farmers of Ohio are intensely interested in this subject. The Senator has referred to the fact that he makes his own experiments. He farms on a very large scale, but the man who has a quarter of a section or an eighth of a section is not able to do that, and he wants the assistance of the different governmental agencies that we have.

Let me illustrate the benefit which it may be to a farmer to study the soil. We had some years ago, and it was before this survey of the soil was begun, a man by the name of J. A. Borst, who had a lot of muck land on his farm. He was not able to produce anything on it. It was a black soil. It looked as if it was fertile, but for some reason it would not grow crops. By the sheerest accident he found out that by placing a certain barnyard fertilizer upon this land it became very productive. Now, that land, which years ago was regarded as almost valueless, is used for celery gardens; it is worth $500 an acre; and the celery industry of that county started with that little accidental discovery of Mr. J. A. Borst.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Was an examination made of that land and was there a report made as to what it should be used for or what should be done on the soil?

Mr. POMERENE. There was not at that time. That was before we knew anything about soil surveys; but I referred to the necessity of soil surveys because it enables farmers to get from the Government the knowledge which otherwise they might not acquire save and except by such accidents as occurred in the case of Mr. Borst.

Mr. GRONNA. The trouble with the contention of the Senator from Ohio is that the money provided for in this item is not used for the purpose which he has so well illustrated, but it is used to make soil maps and plats showing the kind of subsoil, the kind of loam, how much sand there is in it, and what the ingredients of the soil are. That is what it is used for; it is not used to make analyses of the conditions or of the different mineral constituents of the soil.

Mr. POMERENE. It is used to make surveys; but the survey accompanies the very information to which the Senator refers. I have one of these soil-survey maps here. It describes the soils of each one of the several localities of the county surveyed. Here [exhibiting] is a large map graphically showing the kind of soil and the character of the subsoil.

Mr. SWANSON and Mr. SPENCER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from North Dakota has asked whether or not there is any demand from the farmers for the appropriations for soil surveys. In reply, I will state that I myself have had many requests for them; and the farmers in the different counties and sections of Virginia have asked that such surveys be made. Because of the smallness of the appropriation all of the counties can not be surveyed, but I do not know of any such surveys which have been made in Virginia which have not been satisfactory and valuable. I think it would be a great mistake to stop the surveys, especially in localities where there is a great variety of conditions and of soil and of subsoils. I repeat, there is a demand in Virginia for these surveys. Wherever they have been made their distribution has been asked for in the counties; but there are many counties which have not been able to get them on account of the smallness of the appropriation. I think it would be a mistake to discontinue the appropriation.

Mr. GRONNA. Let me say to the Senator from Virginia that if surveys were to be made to benefit the individual farmers we should have to appropriate very much more than $178,000.

Mr. SWANSON. But these surveys are made for a county or for a certain section.

Mr. GRONNA. The expense would run into billions of dollars, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. These surveys are needed for certain purposes. Some farmers know by experience that they do not need a survey; but certain soil is not productive; certain soil does not yield returns and is not valuable; and farmers living in such sections are anxious to have those lands surveyed to ascertain if the scientific service of this Government can make any suggestions as to why the soil is not valuable.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to suggest that this matter is covered by other provisions of the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. But under this provision, if the work is done, the maps and publications will be issued, and the people will get the benefit of what the Government has done? What is the use of doing things and then keeping them under a bushel?

Mr. GRONNA. Let me read the provision. It is as follows:

> For the investigation of soils, in cooperation with other branches of the Department of Agriculture, other departments of the Government, State agricultural experiment stations, and other State institutions, and for indicating upon maps and plats, by coloring or otherwise, the results of such investigations, $178,900.

Mr. SMOOT. The item is for the investigation of soils; and in the investigations a chemical analysis is made of the land, in order to show just what its character is. There is a key to all of the maps, and certain colors indicate certain classes of land. The whole survey is made in that way after a thorough investigation of the land itself.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will allow me, there are certain lands in Virginia where alfalfa will grow well for one or two years, but after that the subsoil is such, being of clay, that when the roots reach it the plant dies out. From a survey the farmer will know what the subsoil is. Maps showing the character of the subsoil in those sections of Virginia have been valuable. I have a demand for these maps, and to have surveys made of those counties which would supply the knowledge in reference to the character of the soils.

Mr. SPENCER. May I ask the Senator from North Dakota, Is it not true that if a farmer wanted to move from one section of the State to another, or if, by some happy chance, for Missouri, the Senator from North Dakota should desire to enter into the Garden of Eden and move to Missouri, would not a survey map of the soil, precisely such as that contemplated by the pending provision, be invaluable to him before he bought his Missouri farm?

Mr. GRONNA. I am very glad the Senator from Missouri has asked me that question. If I should ever get it into my head to move to the State of Missouri, I can assure the Senator that I would go into what I understood to be the best section of his splendid State——

Mr. SPENCER. It is all good.

Mr. GRONNA. Then I would talk to the farmers of Missouri and ascertain what kind of crops they were raising, for, let me say to the Senator from Missouri, they know more about the matter than anybody living outside of the State of Missouri can ever possibly know.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from North Dakota could depend upon what the farmers of Missouri told him, even though they themselves were going to sell him a farm; but that is not true in every State. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. I have not concluded, if the Senator from Utah will permit me.

I simply wish to say in conclusion that I was quite sure that this appropriation would be advocated, because every professor in the agricultural colleges and State institutions throughout this country naturally wants it. I find no fault with them. If we had money to burn, of course, I should not be a party to striking it out; but if any Senator says that this would in any way increase the production of cereals in the United States of America for the next year I doubt if the statement could be substantiated. I know what the work is; I know how it is being done; and I have stated that I did not minimize the value—that was the exact language I used—of these maps, but they are not used by the farmers. It was for that reason only that I rose to say that those who are always so anxious to help the farmer are not helping the farmer by appropriating money for this specific purpose.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator will agree, will he not, that we must look for increased production to the man going from the city to the land, rather than to the man going from the land to the city?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, sir.

Mr. LENROOT. And that there are thousands constantly looking for land who are not expert farmers, as is the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have never posed or set myself up as an expert farmer. There are farmers in my State who have forgotten more about farming than I will ever know, and they are not Members of Congress either; they know how to farm and they do farm. We have agricultural colleges in North Dakota, as has the State of Wisconsin, and we obtain intelligent information from the professors of those colleges, as other States do from similar sources; but that is another proposition. The making of soil maps is a cooperative work carried on by the Federal Government. It is unnecessary to explain the maps, because, I imagine, Senators are familiar with them. Certainly I know what they are; I know the key to them and I know that they illustrate by different kinds of coloring the character of the soil. The agents of the department take a county at a time, and generally finish up that county before proceeding elsewhere.

I do not discredit that work, and, if we had plenty of money, I should like to see it carried on. It was not from any desire to discredit the work that the committee struck the item out, but we thought we could get along without it at least for one year.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true that the average man from the city who goes to the land knows very little if anything about farming and must have reliable data as to the character of the land which he purchases?

Mr. GRONNA. No, Mr. President; there are thousands of people living in the cities who know a great deal about farming; in fact, they know too much about it, for they know that farming is not profitable; they know that farming has been the most unprofitable business in the world.

Mr. LENROOT. But it is not that class who are going back to the land.

Mr. GRONNA. They do not go back, because they know it is not profitable.

Mr. LENROOT. I am speaking of the class of people from the cities who are returning to the land.

Mr. GRONNA. There are people in the cities, of course, who do not know anything about the land. I am not in a position to say whether the soil maps would or would not give them information they desire; perhaps they might afford valuable information; as to that I am not sure, but I am rather inclined to believe that those in the cities who want to move to the country generally get in touch and correspond with people in the country whom they happen to know, and get the information in that way. They learn from such sources whether a particular section is productive or unproductive, and not from these maps; because the maps can not possibly furnish the information necessary to induce people to go from the city to the country.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have always favored this work, although it is my belief that many people have overestimated its importance. If we were living under normal conditions now I would still favor it; but unless Senators and Members of the House are able to stand up against propaganda and say that, in order to meet conditions that confront the country, they are going to cut down appropriations, then all similar items to this will go in the appropriation bills. I think this work is important to be carried on; it is along scientific lines, but the country can get along without it; we need the money now, and we ought not to expend it for this purpose. It will not be true, as has been stated here, in my humble judgment, that if we quit appropriating money for this purpose we never will be able to begin again. I do not think there is anything in that argument.

When soil surveys are to be made the agents of the department go out and take a county at a time, or several counties, and survey them entirely. They do not, as might be thought from some things that have been said here, survey a man's farm when he requests that it be surveyed, but they take a county and complete it.

They may have taken a particular farm here or there, but that is not the way I have ever seen it done, and a great deal of this work has been carried on in my State and is being carried on there now.

This is one item in regard to which I have received a great deal of criticism since the Agricultural Committee reported this bill; it is the only one. Up to to-day I have been able to say that I believed the committee was right and that under existing financial conditions Congress ought to stand behind the committee, and the country ought to do likewise. I presume letters have been written to all Members of Congress asking that the committee be overridden in this matter, and it looks as though such action is going to be taken by the 15 or 16 Senators who have congregated here and that this item is going back into the bill, and, as I have already stated, under ordinary conditions I would be in favor of its going back. But this item, together with thousands of other similar items that we can get along without now, we ought to get along without, in my humble judgment.

It is said here, "Suppose a man in the city wanted to buy a farm, and sent and got one of these maps; he could see just what he was going to get." Well, now, here is a map of Stark County, Ohio. Here is the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. We will say that he is a city fellow. He lives in New York. He never has been out in the country; he does not know anything about it; so he sends to Stark County, and he gets this map, and he looks at it, and immediately when he sees it he knows just what you can do on a farm in Stark County!

Mr. President, it is perfectly foolish. In the first place, that kind of a man never would get one of these maps. If he got it, it would not mean anything to him. He would look on it, and he would see that the yellow meant one thing, and the blue another, and the brown another, and so on. Now, what would he do if he was going out to Stark County, Ohio, to buy a farm? He would go out there first, and he would look at the land. If he did not know anything about land, he would have some friend there. He would not get any information that would assist him in purchasing that land from examining this map. He never would try it. I doubt whether that has ever been done with a map in the history of the United States since this work has been going on.

If this work stops, it will not interfere with the country; it will go on just the same, and we will save this money for a while, as compared with the expenditure at present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. It will stop the work temporarily, will it not?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly it will.

Mr. HARRISON. Perhaps in 500 counties throughout the United States where the work may be one-fourth finished or one-half finished it will have to stop until Congress makes another appropriation.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir; on the 1st of July that work will have to stop. That is true, and some fellows will lose their positions, and every one of those fellows does not want to lose his position. I have nothing against them. I would rather they should not lose their positions; but, great heavens, we can not keep in his position every man who now has one that he obtained during the war. If we are going to economize, we must commence somewhere, and we must keep on going; otherwise we will never accomplish anything.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska further yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield; yes.

Mr. HARRISON. There are thousands of dollars appropriated in this bill for the Bureau of Soils. What will these people be doing all this time?

Mr. NORRIS. If there is anybody left with nothing to do I assume that the man in charge will discharge him.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator's argument is logical in favor of cutting out this appropriation and deferring the work for a while, why would he not cut out the whole appropriation for this particular bureau?

Mr. NORRIS. I would cut out everything that I could, and I have no doubt that if I knew enough about the details there are a good many other places in this bill that I would be in favor of cutting out. Why, let us take the Senator's argument. We voted just a little while ago to eliminate the free-seed distribution from this bill. Now, the Senator could say, "What are you going to do with the fellows that are in that business? Are you going to leave them high and dry, without jobs? What are you going to do with the places they occupy? What are you going to do with the men you send out to buy seeds to make this distribution? What are you going to do with the thousands of people that are dividing up the seeds and putting them into little packages? Are you going to leave them without jobs? Are you going to discharge them?"

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, but the Senator does not catch my point.

Mr. NORRIS. Perhaps we will have to discharge them, and if they are not necessary they ought to be discharged, not because we have anything against them, but it is the same way with every other business that we discontinue. Of course, there will be a good many people discharged.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska further yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, the employees carried under this appropriation will be discharged if the appropriation is not made; but two pages ahead of this the Senator will notice that $78,000 was appropriated for the salaries of employees here in Washington in the Bureau of Soils. Now, the main work undertaken by the Bureau of Soils is the cooperation with the States in making these maps. Why would not the Senator be in favor of striking out this provision of $78,000 for the Bureau of Soils and getting rid of all those people?

Mr. NORRIS. If this item goes out, and the employees are not necessary, then I would be in favor of striking out that item. If this one goes out, and we can save $78,000 somewhere else, for Heaven's sake let us save it, because the country needs it. If the Senator's argument is good, then we might just as well pass a law that would make appropriations to run through all the years that are to come because somebody is going to be discharged if we cut down on appropriations.

This is the great item of expense. It will not take as much paper if this item is eliminated. There is a whole lot of paper used in making these maps. We might say: "Why, the fellows that are in the paper business are going to be injured." Poor fellows. It is too bad. I do not want to injure them, but I do not think we can afford to buy their paper now. There is a great clamor that we are short of paper, and the publishers of newspapers are having trouble to get enough paper to print their issues. If this appropriation were left out of the bill, as the Senate committee has recommended, it would help somewhat in that line.

Mr. President, the same argument is made with every other item except those items that a man would say were items that under no circumstances ought to go in the bill, and I do not say that about this item. I am not belittling it, but it is one of the things we can get along without now; and it seems to me that if we really mean to economize, as everybody has pledged that we will economize, here is one of the places where we can use the ax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 72, in the item of "General Expenses, Bureau of Crop Estimates," on line 6, after "States Relations Service," the committee proposes to insert:

and other Federal, State, and local agencies.

The amendment was passed over at the request of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY].

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, on yesterday I asked that this amendment should go over, because I understood that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] had an amendment which he wished to propose.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I agree with all that has been said here by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] about the need of a strict policy of economy and retrenchment, and I have supported this bill consistently from start to finish; but there are two items here that I think really should be increased. One is the one we have just voted on and the other is this item for the Bureau of Crop Estimates.

It is true, as the Senator from Nebraska has said, that we have been flooded with protests on certain items here, and appeals for increases, and in most instances those were inspired by interested persons; but I have had a great many appeals from people in my State, many of them real farmers, objecting to the reduction in the appropriation for the Bureau of Crop Estimates. This is a work that really appeals to every producer in Kansas, and in every other State, for that matter. It is a direct benefit to the farmer.

I have had so many protests on this particular item that I asked the department to summarize briefly the work that actually had been done and the work that it was necessary to do. They have put it in just a few lines here, and I am going to read that summary:

The Bureau of Crop Estimates during the past six years has accomplished, with inadequate appropriations, the following striking results:

Has perfected a system of crop estimating which has increased its output more than four times.

Has decreased the cost per unit of work more than 60 per cent.

Has established a fruit-crop estimating service, especially for apples and peaches, in response to specific demands of commercial apple growers, which service has been highly satisfactory and has saved the producers large sums of money.

Has established a truck-crop reporting service of great financial value to the growers of these special crops.

Has established a system of reporting the potato crop twice a month at maturity, when potato growers are making selling contracts, which will save to the growers of this one crop more than the entire amount involved in the estimates. A single county saved $100,000 last year as the result of our potato reports.

During the past six years the bureau has been under intensive training and preparation for establishing a comprehensive and constructive system of crop and live-stock reporting coincident with the taking of the 1920 census and with the census data as a basis.

Dependable data with respect to crop and live-stock production are absolutely essential to the business end of farming, especially marketing, which concerns every farmer and live-stock raiser in the United States (about 14,000,000 in number); the annual value of crop and live-stock production involved being more than $20,000,000,000. Such data are essential to much of the constructive work of the Federal Department of Agriculture, State colleges of agriculture, county agents, farm bureaus, and other farm organizations.

* * * * * *

The present appropriation for 1920 under this item is $216,562. In its original estimates the department requested an increase of $550,000 in lump fund for expansion and improvement of the crop and live-stock reporting service. None of this increase was allowed by the House committee. On the contrary, the House reduced the amount of this item by $48,486.

In the revised estimate submitted to the Senate committee the department recommended the restoration of the $48,486 eliminated by the House bill, and in addition $140,000 for extending the live-stock reporting service and $53,438 for county data on major crops, making a total increase over the House bill of $201,924.

I know that it is useless to attempt to have these two larger items inserted here, the $140,000 and the $53,438; but I do believe that the item of $48,486 should be restored, making the appropriation for the coming year exactly the same as it is for this year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the chairman of the committee give the occupant of the chair his attention for just a minute? The Chair understands that the amendment passed over was in line 6, page 72. The amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas applies to the provision at the bottom of the bill.

Mr. CAPPER. No; it is in line 18.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is not to the first amendment of the committee. The question is on the first amendment of the committee, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 72, line 6, after "States Relations Service," it is proposed to insert "and other Federal, State, and local agencies."

The amendment was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On line 15, it is proposed to strike out "$20,000," and in lieu thereof to insert "$25,480."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Now, the Senator from Kansas offers an amendment to the next paragraph, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 72, line 18, it is proposed to strike out "$168,076" and insert in lieu thereof "$216,562," and to change the totals in the lines following to correspond.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas is a very valuable member of the committee, and I do not like to oppose his amendment. But we are overlooking one thing. The report made by the House Committee on Agriculture calls attention to the fact that they believe that some of this work ought to be done by the county agents. It seems to me that it would be the most satisfactory result we could possibly get to secure this information from the county agents and from cooperation with the county agents. It would then be more reliable than the data which we are receiving now.

It is late, and I do not wish to take the time of the Senate, but if I had sufficient time, I could demonstrate to the Senate that there are thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars wasted so far as this bureau is concerned. I trust that the amendment will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 72, line 19, after the word "expenses," the committee proposes to strike out "$188,076" and to insert "$193,556," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $193,556.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In the total for the Bureau of Crop Estimates, page 72, line 20, the committee proposes to strike out "$317,376" and to insert "$322,816."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendments passed over will be found on page 82. The first begins on line 7, after the word "maintenance," in the item for investigations of the best methods of road making, it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "including cooperation with State and municipal governments in roadside planting of ornamental, fruit and nut-bearing trees, the beautification of highways, and the education of the public to a fuller appreciation of scenic values as a factor in rural development and as a nationalizing influence."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, was that recommended by the department?

Mr. GRONNA. It is an amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL]. The representatives of the department approved it. I think this is a very practical way to beautify the country. I do not know why we should not make an effort to plant trees bearing edible fruits or edible nuts. I do not see why that would not be beneficial to the people throughout the country.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that in the early days of Utah this plan was practiced generally and remained so for a number of years. But it developed after a fair trial that it was not practicable.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator understands that there is no increase in the appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. But, of course, if we adopt the amendment next year there will be an increased appropriation asked for that purpose, or it will be no good. This is simply to get it in the law, and next year there will be an appropriation for the purchase of all kinds of fruit and nut-bearing trees, for the planting of them, and for the care of them. I say to the Senator now that unless these fruit trees and nut-bearing trees are taken care of, not by the individual owner of the property near which they are planted, but by the officials of the Government, just the same as the trees upon the streets of the District of Columbia are taken care of, it will be a wicked waste of money. We used to have apple trees planted along the sidewalks, used as shade trees, and we used to have other kinds of trees that would grow in our State, and different fruit-bearing trees. But it was not very long before they went to decay. Whatever is everybody's business is nobody's business. If we are going to undertake to do this, we must understand this, that the Government of the United States has to take care of all of such trees; they have to keep the worms out of them; they have to protect them in every way that similar trees are protected on privately owned land, and if the Government does not do that work, all that they spend for this purpose will be lost. It is all well enough to talk about beautifying the lands along the farms and the streets of the town, but that work does not belong to the Government.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I make a point of order against the proposed amendment as an attempt to incorporate general legislation upon an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The Chair sustains the point of order. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 82 the committee also reported the following amendment: After line 17 to insert the following:

For conducting field experiments and various methods of road construction and maintenance, and investigations concerning various road materials and preparations; for investigating and developing equipment intended for the preparation and application of bituminous and other binders; for the purchase of materials and equipment; for the employment of assistants and labor, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments passed over.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, as we are through with the committee amendments, I propose to offer an amendment. I call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to it, and ask him if he will not accept it and let it go to conference. It does not increase the appropriation at all. It is to be inserted on page 48. The appropriation is $103,728 for making investigations in silviculture, dendrology, and so forth. I propose an amendment providing as follows:

Of this amount $45,000 is available for expenditure during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, to enable the Forest Service, under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, to establish and maintain a forest experiment station at Asheville, N. C., for the purpose of conducting in the Appalachian hardwood and adjacent forest regions silvicultural and other forestry experiments and investigations independently or in cooperation with other branches of the Federal Government, with States, and with individuals, to determine the best methods for the conservative management of timber forests, farm woodlands, and other forest lands, and thus to increase the productiveness of these forests and to perpetuate the lumber and other wood-manufacturing and wood-using industries.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the amount the Senator asks?

Mr. OVERMAN. Forty-five thousand dollars. About 35 years ago George W. Vanderbilt bought a large body of timberland in western North Carolina and established a school there. About three years ago I was in Utah and California and I met one of the leading experts out there, who commended that school, and said what great good it had done in educating the students at that school to understand dendrology and the preservation of trees from disease, fires, and all that. I want to restore this school by the Government, to make experiments in wood management, tree management, in knowing when the tree is ripe, and in knowing how to treat diseases of the tree.

In that section there are 148 different varieties of hardwoods. Instead of having those things studied here in Washington, I propose to have them studied right in the forest, where the trees are, so that the people who learn and become experts can be sent out West or sent anywhere and teach tree management and the management of our forests.

The school did a great deal of good in the time of Mr. Vanderbilt, but he died, and the school went down. If you establish this experimental school, which is recommended by the forestry associations of the country, at this point, I think it would be of great benefit to forestry in the whole country.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to ask the Senator if the Biltmore farm has not been sold by Mrs. Vanderbilt within the last two or three weeks?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Government purchased 60,000 acres of land there at a very cheap price. Mrs. Vanderbilt put it down very low so that the Government could get it. This is in that great Appalachian reserve, which was purchased under the Weeks Act. The Vanderbilt village, which the Senator from Utah speaks of, has been sold. Mr. Vanderbilt built a modern village up in that country close to his home, a beautiful village, and that has been sold.

Mr. SMOOT. I have been all over the place, and I saw the planting of trees at the time Mr. Vanderbilt owned the property.

Mr. OVERMAN. When the Senator was there they had a school of reforestation, and out in the Senator's State to-day they have some of the boys from that school, now experts, whom the Government is using, and the Government can well afford, instead of having that study made here in Washington, as the appropriation proposes, to have it done there. I only ask this small appropriation to enable the students to go on the property where the wood is to study the question so they will know more about it.

Mr. SMOOT. The amount that the Senator asks for is more than a third that is appropriated for the study of silviculture and dendrology in the whole United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. The House gave $35,000.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senate has amended it so as to make the sum $103,728.

Mr. OVERMAN. The House thought $35,000 was enough. I propose to let it go to conference, where the matter can be studied, and see if it can not be worked out.

Mr. GRONNA. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to letting it go to conference. Of course, I will do the best I can to have it retained in the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senator will do the best he can.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not know whether I can get it retained or not, but I will do the best I can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That a yield of 5 bushels or less per acre of wheat on lands owned by those in the drought-stricken regions who borrowed money from the Government of the United States for the purchase of wheat for seed be, and the same is hereby, declared to be a failure, and the borrower whose yield was 5 bushels or less per acre be, and he is hereby, released from repayment of the amount borrowed by him from the Government: Provided, That nothing herein shall release the borrower who signed a guaranty fund agreement, and whose crop was not a failure, from making the contribution provided for in such agreement, but said guaranty fund shall be used as stipulated in the agreement to the settlement of the loans to those whose crop was a failure.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to have some explanation made of the amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. When the department loaned to the farmers in the drought-stricken districts money with which to buy wheat, there was a provision in the contract that if there was a crop of less than 5 bushels to the acre the crop should be considered a failure and the borrower should be released. In the Wichita (Kans.) district, which includes Kansas, Oklahoma, and Colorado, there were over 3,000 loans, and there were about a thousand failures reported, and all of the money has not yet been collected. There was contributed to the guaranty fund by those who raised more than 6 bushels to the acre, who, under the agreement, were to contribute 5 cents a bushel up to 75 cents an acre, over $222,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean that $222,000 over and above what they borrowed was given?

Mr. CURTIS. Over and above what they borrowed. I mean that those who borrowed, those who did have a successful crop, turned back into the guaranty fund two hundred and some odd thousand dollars more than they borrowed. The land bank has failed to release those who had a crop of less than 5 bushels to the acre, although I have here at my desk the contract, which specifically states that if the crop was less than 5 bushels to the acre it should be considered a failure.

Mr. THOMAS. Would not the contract of its own volition relieve them?

Mr. CURTIS. I am just getting to that. It will not relieve them. They will not give up their notes, and they are still asked to pay. I took it up with the department, and they said they hoped we would get legislation, and I offered this amendment after consultation with officers of the Farm Loan Board, so that there will be no question about their authority to release these people under the agreement which was made.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask what reason is given by the farm loan banks for their refusal to release these farmers under the contract?

Mr. CURTIS. The money was loaned out of the war appropriation which was made for the benefit of the President, and it was made upon order or with the consent of the President. This agreement was entered into, and I suppose at that time they did not stop to consider whether Congress had acted upon it or not. Congress not having acted upon it, some of the banks felt that they had no authority to release the people who had crop failures. I am told that in other sections they are releasing those who had crop failures, but in the Wichita (Kans.) district, which includes Oklahoma and Kansas, they are not releasing them. I have had quite a number of complaints, and, as I said, in that district there were about a thousand failures, in round numbers.

Mr. POMERENE It does seem to me that the matter ought to be investigated by the committee and a report made by the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. The committee made a thorough investigation and report, and I have all the papers here. The only reason why the committee did not act at the time we had it up was that I did not have the original contract, which contained the clause that a crop of less than 5 bushels to the acre should be considered a failure. Here is the original agreement:

The crop mortgage of any borrower under said general plan shall be deemed a failure within the meaning of this agreement if the average yield per acre does not amount to more than 5 bushels.

The delay of the committee was because I did not have the original agreement there. The committee thoroughly investigated the matter, and I have all the figures here. I have given the figures in round numbers in reference to the failures. I will state that the number of failures in the Wichita district was 1,159. The amount contributed to the guaranty fund was $222,326.14. If the 1,159 borrowers each borrowed $300—and they were limited to $300 apiece—there would be within $78,000 of enough in the guaranty fund to pay it all off. Many of them borrowed only $120. Three dollars an acre was all they were permitted to borrow.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator's amendment refer to the act under which these loans were made?

Mr. CURTIS. There was no act. That is the difficulty. There was no act, and I referred merely to the loan.

Mr. THOMAS. I misunderstood the Senator. I thought there was an act of Congress.

Mr. CURTIS. No; I said that was the difficulty. There was no act of Congress.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I think the action of the Senator is very appropriate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, on page 93, line 23, I move to strike out the numerals "$100,450" and in lieu thereof insert "$150,450." This means an increase of $50,000 in the appropriation.

This appropriation is made for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act of August 20, 1912, entitled "An act to regulate the importation of nursery stock and other plants and plant products," and so forth. Many of the corn borers and other pests have been brought into this country by the importation of broom corn, and so forth. Some of the men who have been interested in the subject have stated to me that under the provisions of this act there is no appropriation for the purpose of inspection.

I took the matter up with the chairman of the committee and, I understand, he is not entirely clear whether this is appropriated for or not. I ask the Senate that, under the circumstances, this amendment be permitted to pass and let it go to the conference committee for their further investigation. Of course, if ample appropriation is made, I would not insist upon it, but if there is no provision, then, I think, we would all regret if we had failed to make it.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator, and there is no objection to his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Ohio proposes, on page 93, line 23, to strike out the numerals "$100,450" and to insert in lieu thereof "$150,450."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENDRICK. I propose the following amendment, on page 107, at the end of line 7.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 107, at the end of line 7, add the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to turn over not to exceed 50,000 tons of nitrate of soda, out of the reserve supplies owned by the War Department, to the agricultural fertilizer manufacturers of the country to meet the existing emergency of shortage of fertilizers for immediate use, such stocks so turned over to be replaced by such fertilizer manufacturers, out of importations now contracted for, by any equivalent amount of like quality, the turning over and replacement being under such guaranties as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Wyoming that the committee amendment has already been agreed to. So it will be necessary to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I think this is an entirely new provision.

Mr. KENDRICK. It is an entirely new provision.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will strike out the word "Provided," and make this a separate paragraph, I think that will get what the Senator wants.

Mr. KENDRICK. I will modify the amendment as suggested.

Mr. GRONNA. There is no objection to it, so far as I know.

Mr. THOMAS. I would like to inquire whether the Senator has any information as to the supply of the War Department or how this would affect their administration?

Mr. KENDRICK. The members of the committee were informed within the past week that the War Department is required to keep on hand 300,000 tons of nitrates under the law. Am I not right?

Mr. GRONNA. That is correct.

Mr. KENDRICK. There is that amount on hand at this time.

Mr. THOMAS. For what reason is the department required by law to have such a large reserve of nitrate?

Mr. KENDRICK. To take care of any emergency that may arise in the manufacture of explosives.

Mr. THOMAS. It would seem to me a dangerous precedent to enact a law as a rider to an Agricultural appropriation bill which would so seriously reduce that amount.

Mr. GRONNA. The Secretary of War and his experts were before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry last week and several Senators were present, among them the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and several others who are not members of the committee. It is the intention of the Secretary of War to sell 150,000 tons of this nitrate if Congress will pass a bill which is now before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and which we have not yet had time to consider. The bill was introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and it proposes to make an appropriation of $12,500,000. There was, of course, considerable objection to spending that large amount of money. So the Secretary of War, in order to do away with that appropriation, stated that the War Department could dispose of 150,000 tons of nitrate provided we would enact a law authorizing the department to do so. They have not only the amount necessary to be kept on hand, but they could spare the amount which the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] has referred to and which is only in the nature of a loan. It is simply to help out the situation throughout some of the States where they require the fertilizer for immediate delivery, as I understand it.

Mr. KENDRICK. Yes. The situation is, of course, somewhat critical.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand that.

Mr. KENDRICK. And the necessity for action is imperative.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not opposed to the amendment, but I wanted some information as to the effect which the transposition of such a large amount of nitrates might have upon the War Department policy. I am satisfied with the statement of the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KENDRICK. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I assume that this nitrate has been affected by the prevailing high prices. If we are to turn it over to these manufacturers, of course they will be disposing of it to the farmers at the present high rates. Assuming that when it comes to turning back this same quantity of nitrate the price will have very materially declined, are the manufacturers to be the beneficiaries of this Government bounty?

Mr. KENDRICK. The provisions of the amendment are that like quantity of the same quality of nitrate shall be returned. It is also presumable under the situation that the length of time involved in the return of this product will be but a few weeks, but on account of the urgent need of the farmers of the country it might as well be, for all their purposes, as many months. The object of placing it upon this bill is to secure immediate action and take care of a situation that will not permit of delay.

I ask that the amendment be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to, as follows:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to turn over not to exceed 50,000 tons of nitrate of soda, out of the reserve supplies held by the War Department, to the agricultural fertilizer manufacturers of the country, to meet the existing emergency of shortage of fertilizers for immediate use, such stocks so turned over to be replaced by such fertilizer manufacturers, out of importations now contracted for, by any equivalent amount of like quality, the turning over and replacement being under such guaranties as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

Mr. GRONNA. I also offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 99, line 10, after the comma following the word "stock," insert the words "or the erection of barns or other necessary buildings."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought I had an amendment which was pending, on page 61. I offered it yesterday, and asked that it be pending. My amendment was, on page 61, line 18, to increase the appropriation from $110,000 to $131,760.

Th PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secrtary has no record of the fact that the Senator's amendment is pending. The Senator from Mississippi may have proposed it as an amendment intended to be offered, but it has not as yet been offered.

Mr. HARRISON. The amendmnt has been printed. On page 61, line 18, I move to increase the amount of the appropriation from $110,000 to $131,760.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 61, line 18, after the word "products," it is proposed to strike out "$110,000" and to insert "$131,760," so as to read:

For investigations of insects affecting truck crops, including insects affecting the potato, sugar beet, cabbage, onion, tomato, beans, peas, etc., and insects affecting stored products, $131,760.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi is a member of the committee, and I will say that I have no objection to the adoption of the amendment and letting it go to conference. The conference committee will discuss the matter and do what, in their judgment, is best.

Mr. THOMAS. Let us have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to say something, unless the Senate will adopt the amendment without discussion, because it is a matter that is of great importance to the section from which I come. I do not wish to precipitate a discussion or to take up unnecessarily the time of the Senate. The department estimated for an appropriation of $131,760. The committee cut that estimate by $21,760. Under the estimate of the Agricultural Department $65,000 was to be allotted to fight the sweet-potato weevil. The sweet-potato weevil is now prevalent in about seven States. The value of the sweet-potato crop in five States is about $135,000,000. The weevil has been practically eliminated in three States—Georgia, Mississippi, and Florida—I believe, and has been almost eliminated in Alabama, but not in Louisiana nor in Texas. If we stop this work—and it will practically be stopped unless this appropriation can be made—there will be a recurrence of the weevil and a destruction to the sweet-potato crop.

I have had more letters about this item than about any other item in the bill. It seems to me that it is such a small amount for which we are asking—only an increase of $21,760—that it should be granted. It is not any more than has been estimated for by the Department of Agriculture, and I am sure the department was conservative in its estimate.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I wish to say that I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi will be adopted. I had myself presented a similar amendment. In my State a great deal has been accomplished toward the extermination of the sweet-potato weevil, yet it has not entirely been exterminated. The campaign is being carried on there now by Federal authorities assisted by the State authorities. The State is expending more money for this purpose at present than is being expended by the Federal Government. I very much hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHELAN. I offer and ask for the reading of the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 28, line 25, after the word "regions," it is proposed to insert the following:

And the treatment, restoration, and protection from erosion, wash, or drift, by tree planting or other methods, of deforested, burned-over, or flood-formed lands or sands lands.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I may explain that the Federal Government is cooperating with the county of Los Angeles in protection from wash which comes from the mountains in the spring and which drains into the harbor of Los Angeles. The amendment does not involve any appropriation, but merely includes these several objects in the view of the department so far as forestry is concerned. There is a national forest there. It involves no expense.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the amendment be again stated, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Assistant Secretary again read the amendment proposed by Mr. PHELAN.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from California how an investigation can be made without expense?

Mr. PHELAN. I meant to say without any additional appropriation. The amendment merely enables the Forestry Bureau of the Federal Government to cooperate with the county of Los Angeles in preventing erosion and the flow of silt into the harbor. It is offered in the interest of a public work in Los Angeles County, Calif. That is all the information I have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHELAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 37, line 7, after the words "the national forests," it is proposed to insert the following:

Including check dams and other works to prevent erosion, drift, surface wash, and soil waste and the formation of floods in the forest reserves, and.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHELAN. I also offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 29, line 11, it is proposed to strike out "$83,200" and insert "$160,850" and to add the following:

Provided, That of this amount the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to expend $77,650, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purchase of lands occupied by the department's experiment vineyards near Fresno and Oakville, Calif., now maintained under contract with the owners: Provided further, That the land purchased for the Fresno vineyard shall not exceed 20 acres, at a cost not to exceed $12,000, and for the Oakville vineyard not to exceed 20 acres, at a cost not to exceed $15,000: And provided further, That the limitations in this act as to the cost of farm buildings shall not apply to this paragraph.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. PHELAN. Let me explain the amendment. The chairman of the committee is very familiar with this proposal and there appeared before him representatives of the Department of Agriculture. I have here a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, which reads in part as follows:

The whole question of the future of the department's viticultural work bearing on the problems which confront the grape growers as the result of the adoption of the eighteenth amendment has been given careful consideration and the conclusion has been reached that the purchase, equipment, and operation of the vineyards are essential to the effective continuance of the work which should be done to assist the growers to adjust themselves to existing economic conditions. The department's views on the subject, together with estimates of the cost of purchase, equipment, and operation of the vineyards, were communicated to the House Committee on Agriculture in a hearing held on January 16.

By some omission this matter was not reported by the Agricultural Committee of this body. There are now maintained these two stations in California, one at Fresno and one at Oakville, Napa County, for the purpose, in the past, of developing the vines and instructing the growers as to the best method of cultivation and the best varieties to select, which has resulted in the perfection of that industry, which represents an investment of $150,000,000.

There are 175,000 acres in wine grapes now in cultivation in California, and the department has taken up the work of instructing the owners, who otherwise would be despoiled of their property, how to graft on the growing vine, which has a resistant stock, zante currants, or table grapes, or other products, which will not be repugnant to the eighteenth amendment. It is an effort to enable men, without total loss, to save some of the fruits of their industry which has been carried on so long under governmental auspices. The department is in favor of it, the chairman of the committee is in favor of it, and I submit it is a very worthy amendment and should be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not see why the department can not carry on the work for the coming year just as they have carried it on in the past without paying $750 an acre for land at this time for this purpose.

Mr. PHELAN. I will explain to the Senator. The Government does not now own these 20-acre parcels, one of which is worth $15,000 and the other $17,500, and, according to Government reports which I have here, they are the most valuable vineyard lands in the world. The Government has all of its experiment stock there, and all its knowledge is derived from those few acres. The owners, not being able to cultivate their vines profitably for the making of wine, now will sell this particular land heretofore leased.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not blame them for wanting to sell the land.

Mr. PHELAN. They have been leasing it to the Government for a nominal rental all these years because they profited by the experimentations carried on. Now they are broke; their market has been destroyed, and they are selling their land. The Government, in order to preserve the industry and its plant, the accumulation of 20 years, asks that the land be bought at these prices, which are reasonable prices, as the departmental officials have testified.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether it is a fact that the grape crop of California last year brought an unprecedented return to the grape grower?

Mr. PHELAN. The grape crop brought not an unprecedented return, but a very substantial return.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, how can these men be broke?

Mr. PHELAN. Because they were able to sell their wine grapes—an opportunity which is not guaranteed them in the future—for the purpose of making—what? For the purpose of making wine. The dried grapes were actually sold to men who made wine in their own homes; and hence there was a market for them. Now, the enforcement of the law—it was hardly in operation then—will cut them off entirely, so that if they are not broke to-day they are prospectively broke, if that is any satisfaction to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. If the law was enforced, it would have affected the last crop if the grapes were used for the making of wine.

Mr. PHELAN. I am telling the Senator the secrets of the trade. They sold the dried grapes for the very purpose of extracting the juice from the grapes; the grapes were bought by Italians and Greeks, who are supposed to have made wine for domestic use. Thirty thousand permits were granted in the northern district of California for that purpose.

Mr. THOMAS. Can they not do it again?

Mr. PHELAN. No; the law is sometimes enforced in California. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question. Suppose the grapevines were removed from the 20 acres of land, would the Senator give $17,500 for it?

Mr. PHELAN. For 20 acres?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is $875 an acre.

Mr. PHELAN. The price is $600 for the Fresno vineyard and $750 an acre for the Oakville vineyard.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator said that one required an appropriation of $15,000 and the other of $17,500, and as the properties embrace 20 acres each, that would amount to $750 an acre in one case and $875 an acre in another case. I ask the Senator now, if that land were bare of grapevines, would he give $875 an acre for it?

Mr. PHELAN. I am, then, in error; it is $12,000 and $15,000. The acreage has been cut down.

This is what the department says:

These estimates which cover the purchase of the land and the provision of necessary improvements and equipment to make possible the effective independent operation of each experimental vineyard indicate that $47,900 would be required for the Oakville vineyard and $39,850 for the one at Fresno. The improvements essential to the effective operation of the vineyards, such as a barn, cottage, and small laboratory at each place, and a dry house at Oakville, which would need to be provided, should be largely of concrete construction. While somewhat more expensive than wood, under existing conditions in California, it is regarded as cheaper in the long run, because of lower upkeep.

* * * * * * *

The work under way at these stations is of fundamental importance to the viticultural industry of the Pacific coast. It includes the determination of the adaptability of resistant stocks to the soil and climatic conditions of the grape-growing regions and the equally important question of determining the congeniality of the leading commercial fruiting varieties to these resistant stocks. It also includes the determination of the adaptability and value of the fruiting varieties themselves for curing into raisins or "currants" and for utilization as table grapes, either fresh from the vines or after various periods of storage, to supply the consuming demands during the winter season.

All possible ways of accomplishing the solution of these important problems have been considered, and in view of the economic crisis which now confronts the industry no other practical way is seen of carrying this work through to a successful conclusion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understand that no estimate has been made for this; and, if not, I shall interpose a point of order against it.

Mr. PHELAN. There is an estimate, which I have submitted.

Mr. SMOOT. I refer to an estimate coming through the Secretary of the Treasury in conformity with law. If that estimate has not been sent directly to the committee and passed upon by the committee, I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. PHELAN. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee about the estimate. He informed me that it was not subject to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah make the point of order?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I make the point of order.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that a supplemental estimate was sent to the committee. It was not in the original estimate.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not mean a letter from the department. I mean an estimate passing through the Secretary, and submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, according to law. If that kind of an estimate has been sent in, I know that my point of order would not stand; but a mere letter is not in conformity with law, and I make the point of order that no such estimate has been made.

Mr. GRONNA. All I can say is that a supplemental estimate was submitted to the committee. Whether or not it was submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury I am not able to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, I now present the amendment which I offered yesterday, to come in on page 92.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 92, line 22, it is proposed to strike out "$85,000" and insert "$117,000," and in line 23 to strike out "$115,350" and insert "$147,350."

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, I want to say that this amount is necessary for the enforcement of the insecticide act.

About 10 years ago an act to control the manufacture and sale of insecticides and fungicides was passed by Congress. The act is known as the insecticide act of 1910. Since that act was passed it has been estimated that the insecticide and fungicide business of the United States has increased more than 100 per cent; yet the appropriation for enforcing the act has not kept pace with this great growth of the business, and at the present time the appropriation to enforce the act is entirely inadequate. In spite of this, the present Congress, in both the House and the Senate, has made a cut in this appropriation.

The Department of Agriculture, through the Bureau of Entomology, of which Dr. L. O. Howard is the chief, has asked for this amount, and it is merely to bring it up to that estimate that I have presented this amendment. I do not want at this hour to take up the time of the Senate in any explanation of the amendment. I have prepared a statement here giving an outline of the work that has been done throughout the United States, in the apple country and in the wheat section, in relieving them of the insect pest, and also in the great cotton country, showing the great sum of money that could be saved annually by the continuation of this work. In August of last year my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL] presented to the Senate a very interesting account of the work that is being done by the Bureau of Entomology under the direction of Dr. Howard, through his agent or representative, Mr. B. R. Coad; and the department contemplates extending the experiments and work in getting rid of the boll weevil in the cotton country by the establishment of small experimental stations in several cotton States for the purpose of carrying on the experiments with calcium arsenate, which experiments have only been carried on in the Delta country so far, and have given better results in destroying the boll weevil than any other preparation used heretofore.

I sincerely hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall not oppose this amendment, certainly not at this hour; but in view of a little running discussion that we had two or three days ago, which I had the misfortune to precipitate, I desire to read into the RECORD the basis for the discussion to which I refer.

I read an extract from the Atlanta Constitution of October 8, 1919, entitled:

ALABAMA COUNTY ERECTS MONUMENT TO BOLL WEEVIL—SUM OF $3,000 VOTED FOR ERECTION OF SHAFT TO "BILLIE" BOLL WEEVIL.

"All honor to the boll weevil!"

This expression was the slogan among the farmers and business men of Enterprise, Coffee County, Ala., in voting the sum of $3,000 for the erection of a monument to "Billie" Boll Weevil.

The citizens of Enterprise believe the boll weevil has done more good for that section than anything that has happened in years and in appreciation of his splendid services a monument is now being erected and when completed will be placed on the principal thoroughfare and unveiled with befitting ceremony.

Before the boll weevil came to Coffee County the cotton crop was worth $1,500,000. The peanut crop to-day is said to be worth $4,500,000. Coffee holds the record for average peanut production.

I also read an extract from an article published in the New York Times about three weeks ago. It is taken from an account of the general industrial situation in the South, as prepared by a staff correspondent of that paper; and this refers to conditions in Mississippi:

When I asked Gov. Russell how much of a menace the boll weevil was to the prosperity of the State, he replied that it was no menace at all. "The boll weevil," he said, "has been one of the greatest blessings of this State, for it has, by the impairment of the cotton crops, finally induced us to go into diversified agriculture and stock raising, from which our chief prosperity is to come in the future. If we had come to this conclusion 25 years earlier, we would have been a wealthy State by now, not only in potentialities of our soil but in cash."

I got this same opinion from a different angle in talking with an officer of a big cotton-growing concern which is using English capital to finance operations in Mississippi. "We control 46,000 acres," he said, "39,000 of which are in cotton, but that is too much for one concern to devote to that one crop, even at present prices, for the situation in Mississippi calls for diversified agriculture."

There are no quarantine laws against the boll weevil in Mississippi as there are in Texas.

I also offer and ask to have inserted in the RECORD without reading a statement from the Bureau of the Census, Department of Commerce, of March 19, 1920, giving in detail the amount of cottonseed received and crushed at the mills from August 1, 1919, to February 29, 1920, as compared with the same period in the previous year, the aggregates of both being about the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement referred to is as follows:

[Preliminary report, Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, Sam. L. Rogers, Director.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY]. [Putting the question.] The "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I call for a division.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, on page 18, at the end of line 8, I move to strike out "$300,000" and insert "$350,000." The item then would read:

For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in dairy industry, cooperative investigations of the dairy industry in the various States, inspection of renovated-butter factories and markets, $350,000.

The amount of $350,000 was asked for, the same as last year, and the committee cut it down.

Mr. President, I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate, but I have here some facts and figures which I received from Mr. Rawl, of the Agricultural Department, a gentleman from my State, and the figures are simply astonishing. He states here that in this country there are $2,000,000,000 worth of cows outside of dairy animals and dairy bulls, and that the milk product amounts to from 12 to 20 per cent of the food products of the United States, and that the milk bills of the consumers of the country at the present time are $3,000,000,000 per annum.

Mr. President, in this time of high cost of living, high cost of shoes, and everything of that sort, every effort in the world should be made to encourage the production of cows, and I hope this amendment will be agreed to adding $50,000 to the amount.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from South Carolina state his amendment again?

Mr. DIAL. On page 18, line 8, where the amount of $300,000 appears, I move to add $50,000, so as to make it $350,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state, for the information of the Senator from South Carolina, that that has already been done.

Mr. DIAL. I thank the Senate. I did not know that it had been done.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I move an amendment on page 25, line 10. The numerals now read "$40,060." I move to increase the numerals so that they will read "$46,860."

The item reads, in lines 9 to 10:

For investigating the physiology of crop plants and for testing and breeding varieties thereof, $40,060.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 25, line 10, it is proposed to strike out "$40,060," and to insert in lieu thereof "$46,860."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I will make just a short explanation of the amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, my attention was diverted. What is the amendment of the Senator?

Mr. ASHURST. It is proposed, on page 25, to change the numerals in line 10 from "$40,060" to "$46,860." In other words, the amendment would increase the appropriation $6,800. The amount was estimated for at $46,860, and was carried in the Agricultural appropriation bills for the past three years at that sum, $46,860, but for some years it was carried at a much larger sum. It is not subject to a point of order, because it has been estimated for. Under this appropriation the Department of Agriculture has made its investigations as to date culture, and if this appropriation were reduced the excellent work which the department has been carrying on regarding the culture of dates will be stopped or injured. I see the able senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] in the Chamber, and I hope to enlist his vote for this amendment, as his State is the premier date-producing State. I have here a package of the Deglet Noor dates grown at Mecca, Calif., which date sells for $1.50 a pound; and the Department of Agriculture, by virtue of this appropriation of about $6,800 a year, has been able scientifically to study date culture.

Mr. President, the Deglet Noor dates are grown on very sandy soil at the Cooperative Date Garden, Mecca. Ripened by the Trabut-Drummond bag method, which increases percentage of fancy dates at Mecca from 30 to 64 per cent, cuts the number of pickings from 12 to 2, shortens and simplifies final maturation in the curing room. This method will extend date culture throughout the Imperial, Yuma, Salt, and Gila River Valleys in California and Arizona and the middle section of the Rio Grande Valley in Texas. This new discovery, together with the definite recognition of three distinct strains of Deglet Noor and the fruiting out of at least four Deglet Noor seedlings of high quality and full Deglet Noor flavor, puts an entirely new face on the date industry in the Southwest and makes it a promising fruit industry for the irrigated valleys of the Southwest having a subtropical desert climate.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I think I may say in behalf of the committee that they are willing to accept that figure and let it go to conference.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator. Now, Mr. President, whilst on my feet, permit me to say that it is obvious that the Senate can not to-night dispose of my amendment which proposes to transfer $250,000,000 to the reclamation fund, and I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if he expects to dispose of the bill to-night?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; Mr. President, we are now nearly through with the bill, and I do not know of any amendments pending.

Mr. SMOOT. Except this little $250,000,000 item.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, the Senator will have to have a two-thirds vote to suspend the rules.

Mr. ASHURST. I realize that fact.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator knows that we can not take a 50-foot boat and put on it a 100-foot whistle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that the $250,000,000 amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment first offered by the Senator from Arizona, relating to date culture.

Mr. GRONNA. That amendment was accepted, as I understand it.

Mr. ASHURST. Now, I want to ascertain where we are with reference to the business of the Senate, because I have an amendment which proposes to appropriate—I used the word "appropriate"—I should say which proposes to "lend" to the reclamation fund $250,000,000. I call attention to the fact that my proposed amendment is nothing but the bill introduced by the able Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], which proposes to transfer $250,000,000 from the general fund to the reclamation fund. That bill has been reported favorably from a standing committee of the Senate and is now on our calendar.

I realize that it is asking a vast deal of the Senate to put such an amendment on this Agricultural appropriation bill, but I have asserted before, and I assert again, that the Senate of the United States is not afraid to meet any contingency. If it be a bad bill, it ought not to be considered a moment; if it is a good bill, will $250,000,000 frighten you, when I assure you that every dollar will be repaid, and when I further assure you that of the $154,000,000 that have been advanced the reclamation fund $35,000,000 have already been repaid within four years? I am entitled to no credit for the statesmanship displayed in this bill, because the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] drew the bill, and the committee presided over by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] reported the bill. But because one Senator drew it and another reported it, I am none the less its champion, and am in favor of the bill.

My esteemed friend the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], whom, if the Republicans nominate, would be a candidate, and, if elected, an excellent President, read from Collier's Weekly this afternoon. I regret that he did not read all of the article, for the article pointed out that of the 2,500 questions before the American people we are neglecting the primal one, the soil. The question of how the people shall subsist is neglected.

There is widespread hardship over the high cost of living, and let us ascertain if we are taking the proper steps to reduce the high cost of living.

Mr. LENROOT. Has the Senator offered his amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. Let me answer the Senator this way, that my amendment was obviously subject to a point of order, hence some days ago I gave the appropriate notice that I would move to suspend the rules. It is obviously subject to a point of order. So my amendment would arise on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that would require a call for a quorum.

Mr. ASHURST. I am not passing on that question until I reach it.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not want to say anything that is at all abrupt, but I shall make a point of order against this proposal unless a constitutional majority of the Senate shall suspend the rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. ASHURST. What is that?

Mr. THOMAS. I wanted to give notice that I would make a point of order against the proposition, if nobody else did, unless the rules were set aside by the required majority of the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. I thought the Senator was making a point of order against my proposed amendment, and I beg his pardon.

Mr. THOMAS. No; but I will do it if the rules are not set aside.

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly; and that is the very purpose of my motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. THOMAS. It is very obvious we can not get a quorum here to-night for the purpose of voting on the Senator's motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the first amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona has not been formally agreed to. It was accepted by the chairman of the committee. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. That is the date amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I hope that the Senator from Arizona will not insist on calling for a quorum this evening. We have now nearly disposed of the bill. The Senate has been in session for four days on this Agricultural appropriation bill, and it should go to conference as soon as possible, in order that we may harmonize the differences between the two Houses. Of course, the Senator must know that it is impossible to put the $250,000,000 appropriation on this bill. It can not be done. I fully realize that there is a great deal of merit—the greatest of merit—in his proposition, but I think it ought to come up and be decided on its own merits, and not be attached to the Agricultural appropriation bill, and I beg the Senator not to insist on attaching it to the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. ASHURST. I will tell the Senator what should be done. I am anxious to see this bill passed, but, Senators, there must be a roll call on this bill, and before this Congress adjourns there must be a yea-and-nay vote on the Jones-McNary bill to see whether we are going to cope intelligently with the high cost of living question. If there can be a unanimous-consent agreement that the Jones bill, which has been reported favorably, shall be discussed and shall be disposed of, I will, of course, not press it as an amendment here. But, Mr. President, that bill is entitled to a respectful hearing. That bill, it is believed by millions of people, is the key which will solve many difficulties regarding the high cost of living; that it will open farm homes for 800,000 people and put them to work upon the soil growing foodstuffs. If there can be a unanimous-consent agreement that the bill will be disposed of one way or the other within the next two or three weeks, of course I will not insist upon the amendment to-night.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, of course we can not enter into a unanimous-consent agreement with only a handful of Senators here. I am perfectly willing to submit to a roll call upon that bill whenever we can get a quorum. I am going to vote against it. I am going to oppose it, because I do not think we should expend that amount of money and make provision for it now. I will not, of course, oppose the Senator's desire to get a roll call and to have discussion of the bill, but we can not give unanimous consent now for that purpose, and certainly not within the next two weeks.

Mr. CURTIS. If we can not get a vote to-night, why can not the Senator delay presenting the matter until it comes up? It will have to be discussed then.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will yield, I will say to the Senator from Arizona that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is very anxious to take up the Post Office appropriation bill to-morrow, and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is exceedingly anxious to have the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill disposed of. They are both on the calendar, and we are really pressed for time, and I hope the Senator will let us pass this bill to-night, so that it may go to conference.

Mr. ASHURST. I want the Senate to pass it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I want to say that I have one or two amendments that I shall present before this bill is passed. I have referred to them a number of times in the course of the debate, and I have been waiting here very patiently, and all I ask is a hearing and an opportunity to present the amendments.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think I am as heartily and as earnestly in favor of this proposition as is the Senator from Arizona. I know he is very earnestly in favor of it, but I am convinced that we can not get a two-thirds vote to suspend the rules. In other words, we will not get a vote on the merits of the proposition on the motion to suspend the rules. There are some I know who are very friendly to irrigation development, but who are consistently opposed to suspending the rules to make amendments in order on appropriation bills, and I am constrained to ask my friend from Arizona to refrain from making a motion to suspend the rules on this bill, and let us endeavor hereafter to try to get this measure up on its merits, when we will not have to overcome a proposition to suspend the rules, which is very difficult, as the Senator knows. I would like to see this matter disposed of and voted on, and have stayed here in the hope we would get to do it. But I believe that under the circumstances it is better for the cause that the Senator and I are very much interested in that he do not press his motion to suspend the rules on this.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, of course the overtures of my esteemed friends on both sides of the Chamber who favor the Jones bill, the overtures which have been made by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], as well as the suggestion made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and the chairman of the committee, have had and should have much weight with me. The able Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is the author of this bill. To him and to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] should go the credit, and will go the credit, in my judgment, of this great measure, and I feel, although it is 6 o'clock, I ought to say that in my judgment no more important piece of legislation will be presented to the Sixty-sixth Congress than this bill. That seems like a far-fetched statement; but, Mr. President, after careful review, lasting for months, and investigation which has lasted a long time, I am convinced it is the most constructive piece of legislation that will be presented to this Congress.

I do not claim to be wiser than other men, but I fear that when the bill comes up on the calendar, obviously some one will object and should object, because we can not discuss the bill under the five-minute rule. We will be cluttered with bills, and the result will be that this Congress will adjourn the middle of June and this important constructive measure will not be galvanized into law.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely want to ask the Senator if he thinks it wise or fair to the people of the United States for Congress to adjourn in June with all these important measures pending for consideration?

Mr. ASHURST. I think Congress will adjourn in June.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not. I know the prediction is always made in March that we will adjourn in June, but we generally adjourn about the 1st of October.

Mr. ASHURST. Let me illustrate: I use my own State because I am more familiar with the reclamation projects in that State than I am with the reclamation projects in other States. Consider the Salt River project in Arizona, constructed at a cost of $14,738,768. The project began to repay the Government in 1916 and has already repaid, up to June 30, 1919, the sum of $4,597,290. During the agricultural year 1916 there were 173,359 acres cropped, and the value of the crop was $8,435,719.

In the agricultural year 1917, 201,600 acres were irrigated and the value of the crop was $13,690,000, nearly double that of 1916. For the agricultural year 1918 there were cultivated 205,600 acres, and the value of the crop for the year 1918 was $18,188,000.

For the year 1919 there were under cultivation 205,000 acres, and the value of the crop for the agricultural year 1919 was $25,700,000, and the same history comparatively may be told of other projects.

What has happened under this reclamation law? The bill was approved June 17, 1902, and 2,000,000 acres of theretofore worthless desert land have been made productive, 400,000 persons housed or growing crops thereon, and each year $80,000,000 worth of agricultural produce raised on land which was prior to that time nothing but a desert. The value of the irrigated lands amounts to about $360,000,000.

So I hope the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who drew the bill, and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], chairman of the committee that reported the bill, will at an early date move to proceed to the consideration of the bill, to the end that it may be determined on its merits, and I realize that it is a serious handicap to be required to obtain a two-thirds vote to suspend the rules. In making these aggressive moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill they will do their country a service beyond the range of eulogy. It was statesmanship for them to draw the bill and introduce it and have it reported. What they need now, and I know they will supply it, is aggressive courage behind that bill to pass it through the Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I now move to strike out, on page 26, line 3, the figures "$86,410" and to insert the figures "$111,410." That will enable a project to be completed that has been under way for two years and which was recognized by Congress on the estimates of the department two years ago.

Mr. GRONNA. The hour is growing late, and I will say to the Senator, so far as the committee is concerned, we will accept the amendment offered by him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 26, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the numerals "$86,410" and insert the numerals "$111,410," so as to make the clause read:

For acclimatization and adaptation investigations of cotton, corn, and other crops introduced from tropical regions, and for the improvement of cotton and other fiber plants by cultural methods, breeding, and selection, and for determining the feasibility of increasing the production of hard fibers outside of the continental United States, $111,410.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the proviso in lines 14, 15, and 16 on page 103 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That not to exceed $100,000 of said sum of $200,000 may be used to pay the cost or value of crops or other property injured or destroyed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I reserved one amendment in Committee of the Whole for separate vote in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, except the amendment reserved by the Senator from Texas.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, on page 27, in line 7, I move to strike out the numerals "$359,705" and to insert in lieu thereof the numerals "$439,705," which will have the effect of preserving certain wheat experiment stations in a number of States which ought not to be discontinued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote by which the amendments of the committee were agreed to will have to be reconsidered.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I make that motion.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Texas proposes to amend by striking out the numerals "$359,705," in line 7, on page 27, and inserting in lieu thereof the numerals "$439,705," so as to read:

For the investigation and improvement of cereals and methods of cereal production, and the study of cereal diseases, and for the investigation of the cultivation and breeding of flax for seed purposes, including a study of flax diseases, and for the investigation and improvement of broom corn and methods of broom-corn production, $439,705.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee striking out the numerals "$212,505" and inserting in lieu thereof the numerals "$359,705."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. GRONNA. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. GRONNA, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. GORE conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 27, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 26, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, God our Father, whose essence is love, we thank Thee that Thou hast made us rational, moral, spiritual beings and filled our souls with immortal hope, the dynamo which pushes us on to the larger, purer civilization; that Thou hast not left us alone to grope our way in darkness, for when we live to our moral and religious convictions the still, small voice encourages and cheers, and when we do an ignoble act the still, small voice cries out in earnest protest.

Continue, we beseech Thee, with us, through us, in us, until we reach the goal of perfection which Thou hast set for us in the incomparable life, character, and deeds of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

HOUSING FACILITIES.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7656) to repeal the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, and to provide for the disposition of all property acquired under and by virtue of the same, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7656, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand it the Senate struck out all after the enacting clause of the House bill and inserted their own bill.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. There is but one amendment?

Mr. LANGLEY. It is all in one amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. LANGLEY, Mr. ELLIOTT, and Mr. CLARK of Florida.

BONUS TO EX-SERVICE MEN.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes in order to have read in my time a communication and petition from 184 ex-service men who are now attending the University of North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. What is the petition about?

Mr. POU. It sets forth the views of these 184 students of the university on the question of additional pay.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHAPEL HILL, N. C., March 23, 1920.

The Hon. EDWARD W. POU,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. POU: I have the honor to transmit herewith a communication containing the signatures of 184 ex-service men who are now students in the University of North Carolina. As you will note, this sets forth our views on the pending legislation before Congress and gives you the information requested in your telegram to Mr. Cashatt. The delay is accounted for by the fact that last week was examination week, and we were not able to get together for a discussion of the matter.

By "lump-sum bonus," which we have gone on record as opposing, we mean giving the same amount to each man, regardless of whether he served two months or two years. If it is the purpose of Congress to help us get started again, we think whatever is done should be in the form of additional pay based on the time served.

Assuring you of our most profound gratitude for the interest you have seen fit to manifest in our behalf, and with many personal good wishes, I am,

Very sincerely, yours, BRYCE LITTLE.

CHAPEL HILL, N. C., March 22, 1920.

To the North Carolina Senators and Representatives in United States Congress (through Hon. Edward W. Pou):

We, the undersigned ex-service men at the University of North Carolina, earnestly oppose any bill providing a lump-sum bonus for the men who served in the late European war, since the injustice of it is plainly apparent.

But if Congress should see fit to remunerate us further for our service, we strongly and respectfully recommend to our Senators and Congressmen that they favor a bill giving additional pay proportional to the time served.

Should additional pay be granted, we intend to use it for the continuance of our education, which was interrupted by our entrance into the service.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 5346. An act for the relief of the Eastern Transportation Co.;

H. R. 12954. An act providing for the relief of populations in Europe and in countries contiguous thereto suffering for want of food;

H. R. 946. An act for the relief of James A. Showen;

H. R. 1317. An act for the relief of Robert T. Legge;

H. R. 12467. An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 909. An act for the relief of Ellen Agnes Monogue.

AMERICAN SOLDIER DEAD.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement from my brother-in-law, Dr. S. F. Wadsworth, who is now and for months past has been in France, at Chateau-Thierry, in reconstruction work, though not employed by the Government, which statement emphasizes the notable and gratifying achievements of the Americans in reclaiming the bodies of our soldier dead.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

A MEMORABLE DAY WITH THE DEAD IN CHATEAU-THIERRY.

CHATEAU-THIERRY, March 3, 1920.

We are living in Chateau-Thierry, not primarily for the dead but for the living. Our work is that of a social service for the living inhabitants of the town, in loving memory of the American boys who gave their lives in this vicinity for France. We are seeking by this living memorial to strengthen ties of friendship which must ever be cherished by the two nations. The soil of Chateau-Thierry has been made sacred forever by the sacrificial blood of our brave boys.

Our building will stand here on the banks of the Marne, within stone's throw of the demolished bridge so memorable in the history of the retreat of the Germans in their march to Paris in 1918. It will stand for a memorial to the Americans who have given their lives here, while in reality it is for service for the people of the town.

This morning I was called upon to leave the service for the living and go with some men to locate the graves of several American soldiers which had been reported to me. Quite often such word is brought to us of graves back in the woods or in the open fields, where the plowshare has turned up the traces of a hitherto unmarked burial, or some one rambling in unfrequented woods comes upon evidences of an American grave. We report these findings to the caretaker of the Belleau Woods Cemetery, whose duty it is to bring the bodies into this national inclosure.

We are glad to know that the United States is doing more to reclaim her dead than any of the Allies. The British have as yet been able to do little toward recovering their dead soldiers from the soil of France, while poor France has had altogether too much to do for her remaining wounded and destitute living to even bring in a fractional part of the soldiers lost on the fields of battle. Really, a small percentage of the American soldiers who fell in France still remain in unmarked graves.

There are perhaps 150 of our boys who were buried in the town cemetery of Chateau-Thierry. These are in the central part of a large addition to the ancient burial ground now occupied by soldiers' graves entirely. Ours are distinguished by the plain, simple, white cross, each bearing the name of the lad who sleeps beneath the sod. Long rows of these pure white crosses make the place very beautiful to us. In this same inclosure there are hundreds and hundreds of German graves which were made doubtless during the time when the Germans occupied this side of the Marne. These are marked with black crosses and have no other ornamentation, while in this same cemetery one sees thousands of French graves, with a simple cross bearing the tricolors of the Republic, and usually covered with beautifully colored flowers of beadwork.

At Belleau Woods, about 4 miles from Chateau-Thierry is one of our national cemeteries, having now over 2,900 of our American soldier boys, who fell in this vicinity. Fere-en-Tardenois, another beautiful national burial ground, is about 7 miles distant. In this there are over 4,000 bodies. Near this is the grave of Quentin Roosevelt.

At Romaine there are more than 26,000. There are several other central burial places for our American soldiers. Sometimes we have heard rumors that these great national cemeteries would be given up by our Government, the bodies being removed to the United States. We feel that such reports are untrue, since few would wish their dead removed from the sacred fields which must always be associated with their heroic death, and which must always be kept in state by our grateful Government, attracting thousands of reverent visitors who must ever be inspired by their lives.

It has been interesting to know intimately the people of these villages in the Marne Valley and to see how deeply appreciative they are of what the Americans have done for them. While we must know that more than any other it was the American shells that destroyed their village homes, it was our own boys who set fire to Chateau-Thierry, but invariably the people will tell us that it was absolutely necessary in order to drive the Germans out of their strongholds.

From time to time the people come to us telling of the finding of American graves. We have gone out with them, feeling glad for their solicitude for our American soldiers.

This morning I went to one of these villages from which had come the word that Madame Assailly had found four graves. We found her with her aged crippled husband living in a poor shell-torn house down near the banks of the Marne. While she was hurriedly making her toilet to ride with us in our automobile—hearse—her husband told of the time when the bombardment of their village was made and how, because of his lameness he was left behind while his wife was taken away prisoner by the Germans. One could easily see the pleasure felt by the old lady in being able to give this valuable information to us concerning our dead. Our road led back about 2 miles from Charteves, where we left the machine in the road and walked into the woods. The tops of the trees were torn and broken with the shells. Telephone wires were still hanging in the branches and stretching along the ground. One could but wonder what messages had been sent through them on that awful day when our boys were falling all through those woods.

At last hurrying on before us Madame Assailly brought us to the place where lying about 50 feet from each other were three places marked with improvised crosses made of sticks or laths about 2 feet in length. On two of these had been placed the identification tags of the boys at the time of their burial. The other had no name, but the cross only. On the cross had been tacked a small portion of an English pocket testament. It has been there through the long months of exposure, and yet easily deciphered were the precious words of Scripture. Had they been in the pocket of the lad who slept beneath them or had they at last brought comfort to him in his death? These were questions which we wanted to ask from the single monitor of that lonely grave, as it clung there to the cross above the sleeping form. Investigation revealed upon the body the two identification tags, showing that he had been quickly buried on the field of battle. In the pocket was a fountain pen.

In it was ink still waiting to tell the story of that awful day.

Almost the letters on the tags were illegible, but by comparing the two we could easily read the name "Ritchie Childress, Co. H, 144 Inf., U. S. Machine Gun."

With tender feelings we lifted the remains into a new burlap cloth and they were later placed in a box for burial.

The body nearest this one was found to be in much the same position, showing evidences of the fearful battle.

His name was Raymond Baldwin, Company D, Seventh Infantry, No. 541321. The other grave was of one whose first name I have not, but the last name was St. John.

As we turned to go back to the road, Madame Assailly remarked that it was to her a great happiness to render the service to the Americans who had done so much for them. "It was the Americans who delivered us," she said. "Had it not been for them we would have remained with the Germans as prisoners." As we came into the road she was telling us in most graphic manner her experiences on the night of the 29th of May, now nearly two years ago when she had been brought up this very same road literally at the point of the German bayonets. She would imitate them as she would aim the gun at her imaginary prisoners as they were being driven along the road.

It was after 12 o'clock at night when they came to the house in which she and her crippled husband were living. Their daughter with her husband and children had fled with the French when the village was evacuated. Her aged husband had been left reluctantly behind because it was not possible for him with his crutches to make the long journey with the others. Madame Assailly was determined that she would share with him his fate. But the Germans would not let her remain, and not being able to compel him to walk with his crutches they left him in the house with the falling shells. They parted, never expecting to see each other again. She in company with 11 of her neighbors was marched back several miles from the bombarded village to a farmhouse, where they stopped for a time, to resume their long, hard journey back into Belgium.

I asked her if she had plenty of food while in her eight months' imprisonment. She stepped over to where a dandelion was growing, picked it saying, "We had that and other weeds on which we lived and did our hard day's work." "But," she added, "the Germans were not cruel to us. They had little of food that they could give to us." She told us of the awful experience when she was compelled to leave her husband behind with his crutches, not expecting ever to see him again, and of the joy they had when, after the armistice, they found each other in the old home at Charteves.

There was one other grave which was known to Madame Assailly and we must go to find it. This time it led us back from the beautiful little village of Mont St. Pere, the home of the famous artist L'Hermite. Magnificent views of the valley were had as we whirled up through an unfrequented road leading back from the river. Then a cart path brought us from the main road through a pasture and some woods to what had been before the war a fine old estate. It had been the residence of the Government official whose duty it was to guard all the woods in this part of the Department of Aisne. Now, the place was desolate and absolutely forsaken. Shell torn and broken, the walls of the house were still standing. Not a living soul anywhere to be seen. The only sound heard was the exquisite notes of the first spring birds. Sunshine was everywhere. But there close to the wall in the garden was the American grave which we sought. This one had been carefully marked by some friendly French hands. The cross had been well made by hand, painted white, and bore the inscription in plain letters, "Harold Millington, Co. G, 4th Inf., U. S. A. Juliet 1918. Mort pour la Patrie."

A large green wreath of laurel leaves had been hung upon the cross and a cross of the same leaves laid tenderly upon the mound.

Opening the grave we found the body carefully wrapped in an Army blanket.

We returned to Chateau-Thierry with our load of precious dead. I am glad to know that these are no longer resting in their lonely and unmarked graves, but will be forever guarded with national honor in our own beautiful Belleau Woods. As the visitor approaches the cemetery he sees in the distance these thousands of pure white crosses which suggest either a drift of snow at the foot of the Belleau Hill or a field of daisies. The place must be forever an inspiration to all who will come to pay tribute to our brave boys who gave their lives for us here in Chateau-Thierry.

JULIAN S. WADSWORTH.

THE PRICE OF GASOLINE.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House resolution 501, respecting an investigation into the price of gasoline, and so forth.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House resolution 501. Is there objection?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the matter to which the gentleman refers will not take to exceed 5 or 10 minutes, I will not object; otherwise, I shall have to object.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the resolution reported.

The SPEAKER. Of course, no one can guarantee how long a matter will take after the House once gives its consent. Gentlemen must either object or give consent. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the bill H. R. 11551, which I introduced, to amend the war-risk insurance act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13266, making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the Government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes. Pending that motion, I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] if he has his mind made up or will consent to a unanimous-consent agreement concerning the time for general debate?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman from Minnesota make some suggestion.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Owing to the number of requests that have been made on both sides of the House, I do not see how we can get along with much less than four hours of general debate, if that is satisfactory.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is two hours on each side?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is satisfactory.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make the request that general debate be confined to four hours, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas and two hours by myself.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to four hours, two hours to be controlled by himself and two hours by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN]. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DYER) there were—ayes 97, noes 0.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 300, nays 2, not voting 125, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13266, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13266, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13266) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the formal estimates upon which the present bill under consideration is based carry $20,329,428.77. Based upon those formal estimates, the committee have presented to the Congress a bill carrying upon its face $18,190,484.87. This bill is $2,138,944 less than the estimates. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13266, the District appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon this bill be limited to four hours, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to four hours, two hours to be controlled by himself and two hours by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN]. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, will the debate be confined to the bill?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It will pretty generally. At least as to all those who have spoken to me; but I am afraid some of them will want to deviate a little bit.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Reserving the right to object, it was not understood that the debate be confined to the bill?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It is not.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13266.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the District appropriation bill, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 13266, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13266) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] is recognized.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, as I just stated, the bill under consideration is $2,138,944 less than the formal estimates submitted to the committee. However, the appropriation last year, in the 1920 bill, was $2,103,962.12 less than the bill which we are now considering. It simply shows this, that the city of Washington, the National Capital, is not only increasing in size and in population, but in all other ways, and your committee, after having sat and very industriously worked for a month or more, decided upon material raises in many of the matters submitted to us by the estimates.

Some of those material raises were in consequence of the public schools. In this bill we have raised the public-school teachers, generally speaking now, $946,800, and I, for the first time, discovered that the school-teachers of the District of Columbia are reasonably well satisfied with the performance of this committee. Now, it rests with you, gentlemen, whether you will continue them in that good satisfaction.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman indicate about how much the salary is increased to each individual teacher, approximately?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will get to that a little later, but I will say for the gentleman's benefit that the lowest paid school-teacher under this bill, the lowest basic salary, is $1,200, and at the present time, if that is adopted, the lowest salary will be $360 greater than that, or $1,560 a year. It ranges from that up to $2,750, and I believe, as I said before, that the teachers of the District, including the officials, principals, and all employees, are thoroughly satisfied with the conditions of this bill.

Again, another item. You have a very competent and efficient police force in this city. They had previous to this year only about 800 policemen, but through legislation on the District legislative bill they increased their number. They increased legislatively their salaries. Therefore while you may give this committee credit in some way, yet we followed the legislation strictly, and hence there is an increase of several hundred thousand dollars in policemen's salaries in the District of Columbia, and the number, if this bill passes, in addition to the legislative bill, will be very nearly 900.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. GARD. As for the number of policemen the gentleman speaks about as being 900, does that number include all special policemen who are added to the department, like park policemen?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That includes them all, I understand.

Again, the firemen of this city thought they were not getting pay enough, and the Appropriations Committee was unable to help them out in previous years. But the District legislative bill has now fixed their salaries, increasing them several hundred thousand dollars, and we have that in this bill.

I cite those items to show you why this bill is large, and I will put in the RECORD this little statement:

CHIEF ITEMS OF INCREASE OVER 1920 ACT.

Schools	$1,200,000
Street improvements	40,000
Street repairs	125,000
Street assessment work	85,000
Sewers	129,000
Water department	95,000
Charities and corrections, hospitals, asylums, workhouse, etc	200,000
Approximately	2,000,000

There are other small items of increase and decrease, but these are the main items which cause this bill to be $2,000,000 more than last year.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I would like to ask the gentleman how this budget compares with other cities of approximately the same size as the city of Washington?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The budget on what?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. The police force and firemen's force. You speak of a great increase in the pay of firemen and policemen, and I would like to know whether the cost to the city of Washington is in excess of that of other cities of the same size or below it?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Well, I will say in answer to the gentleman that the city of Washington, if this bill passes, as I believe it will, will have nothing to complain about as to policemen's salaries or firemen's salaries.

Neither will they have any cause to complain about teachers' salaries, and when we get the entire building program through for the building of schoolhouses I think the city of Washington will be on a par with almost any city in the United States.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman just stated a moment ago that the lowest salary for teachers is $1,200.

Mr. RICKETTS. One thousand five hundred and sixty dollars.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It will be $1,560. The basic salary is $1,200. There will not be a teacher who will get less than $1,560.

Mr. RAKER. That will include those who were placed on the roll by virtue of the deficiency bill?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes. I state emphatically that there will not be a single teacher of any grade or character in the District of Columbia that will not draw down next year $1,560.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the number of teachers been increased over the number last year?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They have been.

Mr. FOSTER. How much?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They have increased by 149, I think, to be exact.

Mr. RAKER. One hundred and forty-nine teachers are added by virtue of the deficiency bill of March 3, 1920?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAKER. The basic pay is $1,200, and they all get the bonus in addition to that?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes; they all get the bonus, and they all get the longevity.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. How about the school housing facilities? Have you made provision for all the children of school age in the District?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is a pretty hard thing to say. I am going to get along to that pretty soon. If we have not made provision here, it is because we have not got the money. When we come along to certain provisions in this bill, if any gentleman says we have not made adequate provision in here, I want him to sustain a little piece of legislation which is incorporated in this bill increasing the taxes on the people of the District of Columba in order to raise the money to do it.

Mr. LAZARO. Does not the gentleman think the time has come when we should provide for every child of school age, not only in the District but all over the United States?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes; the time has arrived.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. YATES. What is the District cost to the United States? Is it just one-half of the budget?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is the supposition.

Mr. YATES. What did it cost the United States the past year?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It cost the United States one-half of $16,086,522.75.

Mr. YATES. A little over $8,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And this year, if the half-and-half is strictly carried out, it will cost the United States $9,675,995. That is what this bill contemplates. But, my friends, I wish you to understand this: We have a committee in here called the Committee on Appropriations. That committee has subcommittees. One is called the deficiency subcommittee, and another is called the sundry civil subcommittee, besides other subcommittees; and invariably those amounts are raised by items recommended by those subcommittees on other bills. Last year they were raised quite a considerable sum, more than $100,000 or $200,000 perhaps, and that has always been the case, and always will be.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Did the gentleman say in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO] that the time was not only here, but had been here for some time when the Congress should provide for every child of school age throughout the United States?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I hardly understood him so. I understood him to say——

Mr. WALSH. I asked what the gentleman from Minnesota said in reply.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am willing to have the RECORD read on that, in order to be exact.

Mr. WALSH. I just wanted to know.

Mr. LAZARO. I wish to remind the gentleman that he was not asked if Congress could do it all, but if the time had not come when provision should be made for every child of school age, not only in the District of Columbia but throughout the United States. I was not referring to Congress only.

Mr. WALSH. If you were not referring to Congress, what were you referring to?

Mr. LAZARO. I was trying to find out from the gentleman if provision had been made for sufficient schoolhouses for the children of school age.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I did not understand the gentleman from Louisiana to say that this Government should provide for the children of the whole United States.

Mr. LAZARO. I did not intend to ask that question. I made it plain, as I thought.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. In response to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES], the gentleman from Minnesota gave the amount to be paid out of the General Treasury if the half-and-half plan is adhered to. What will be paid out of the General Treasury if the plan which the committee suggests is adopted in lieu of the half-and-half plan?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Nothing greater under this bill except—and I will read you this exact statement. I am talking about this year.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not inquiring about this year; but when the committee's plan is put in force, what would be the contribution from the General Treasury? I understand the committee recommends an increase of 66⅔ per cent property tax in the District, and I am anxious to know whether the increased tax will offset the increased expenditures carried in the bill, or will the increased tax provide a fund largely in excess of the increased expenditures?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I could not say as to that.

Mr. OLIVER. In other words, will the increase in the property tax you recommend more than offset the increases in the expenses of the District, which you recommend?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I hardly think so. I was going to get along to that in a moment, and I was going to give some reasons why we did that, and some figures along that line when I got to that particular part. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. After I have talked 35 minutes, please call my attention to it.

Mr. OLIVER. Just to follow that up this thought occurs to me, that it may be easy for Congress to recommend large increased expenditures, larger than are allowed by other cities for the same purposes, so long as Congress feels that the money will come out of people living in the District, or owning property therein, and who have no voice in the matter. Congress must be fair in fixing this scale of expenditures, and also in providing what part thereof shall be contributed by the Government.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will state to the gentleman that when we arrive at that portion of the bill about raising taxes I will be pleased to give the gentleman all the information I have. I think there are other gentlemen here who have been Members of Congress for 15 or 20 years who are familiar with the workings of the District government, who can give you all the information you desire along that line.

Mr. FOCHT. Reverting to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO], I am afraid it might be inferred from his question that there are States in this country that do not make adequate provision for the education of their children. Now, I hope no such impression may go abroad with regard to Pennsylvania, where we have free schools, free books, and compulsory education. It may be that some States are so hopelessly behind the times that it might be raised as a question for action on the part of the Federal Government, but I want to deny that any such condition exists as far as Pennsylvania is concerned. I should like to have the gentleman say whether it is a fact that most States do make all necessary provision for the education of their youth.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the commissioners of education at their meeting some time back were thoroughly agreed that the teachers throughout the United States are not being paid enough, and as a result of it the attendance in normal schools is about half what it should be. Not only that, over 100,000 teachers throughout the United States, in every State of the Union, have left their schools to enter other lines of work. I was not referring to any place in particular. I merely wanted to bring out in answer to my question whether or not in the District of Columbia provision has been made for enough schoolhouses for the children of school age.

Mr. FOCHT. What the gentleman refers to might occur as an emergency, as the result of an exigency growing out of the war, and that with the increase in the cost of living the pay of teachers should be advanced. We must understand that, of course; but the great underlying principle must not be overlooked, which is the education of the youth of the country, and I want to say that most States that I know anything about have made provision for that. Of course, if there is a temporary interruption in the complete exercise of that great fundamental idea, we will have to meet that as we go along; but there is no general lack of educational facilities.

Mr. LAZARO. This statement came from the commissioners of education at a national convention, that 145,000 teachers in the United States had quit their employment because they were not paid enough.

Mr. FOCHT. They ought to be paid enough. Let us go back home and raise the pay of teachers commensurate with their high calling and the requirements of new conditions consequent upon the sky-high cost of living.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And raise the taxes at the same time.

Mr. RHODES. The gentleman from Louisiana asked the gentleman from Minnesota how the cost of maintaining the police and fire departments in the city of Washington compared with the cost of maintaining those departments in similar cities throughout the United States. The answer was that if this bill passes the gentleman thought the city of Washington would have no complaint. I take it that hardly answers the question. I should like to know how the cost of maintaining these departments does compare with other cities of about the same size.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The cost in some cities is much higher and in some cities much lower, but this is a happy medium, about an average in favor of the city of Washington. That would be my answer.

Mr. RHODES. Can the gentleman name one city where the cost is higher?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. New York and Chicago.

Mr. RHODES. Can the gentleman state the figures?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The hearings are full of figures. There are many of them, and it is impossible, owing to the thousands of items, to carry them all in my head, but I am stating the general condition. Heretofore, in the last three or four years, while I have been on this particular subcommittee, we have had many requests to build more school buildings. In nearly every case the committee acceded to those requests and made appropriations for the building of additional rooms in schoolhouses, or new buildings, and when we would report an appropriation of $50,000 or $60,000 or $70,000, the amount estimated by the engineer commissioner, they would go ahead and attempt to put up that building with that appropriation. That was all they asked for. When they attempted to let it out by contract they found that more money was necessary. Hence they came back the next year and asked for more. The next year this committee doubled their appropriation. Generally speaking, that is about the situation, that they then attempted again to build a building but could not get a contract within the limitation, and came back and asked us for more, and we increased the appropriation again, so that a little proposition that would ordinarily amount to $50,000 or $60,000 can not now be built for $200,000. That is true also of the extension of streets. I presume the war brought about that condition, but Congress was not to blame for not furnishing facilities here. The commissioners made their estimates too low. I do not wish to blame them. Congress acceded to their requests. This bill took all the previous buildings that were in contemplation, except possibly one or two, where appropriations have been made, and in many instances we doubled the previous appropriation. That is contained in this bill, and that is why the bill is so large. That is why the revenues of the District of Columbia, when duplicated from the Federal Treasury, are not sufficient to pay the required amount. That is one reason why we are asking to raise taxes in the District of Columbia. For instance, the total appropriation for public schools has increased from $3,761,470 to $4,959,340, or an increase of $1,197,870. We are going to try again and see if we can build the buildings for the amount that we herein appropriate. We do not make the estimates. The commissioners make the estimates and submit them to us.

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. I should like to know how the rate of taxation in the District of Columbia compares with the rate in other cities.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will get to that in a very few minutes. The taxes in this city must be raised. I am going to back that up by making the assertion that of the many business men who came before our committee in the last six weeks, when we asked them, "What shall we do? How can we pay these expenses?" in variably, with one exception, they said "Raise our taxes."

Let me show you why they have got to raise the taxes. Their estimates this year were $23,933,357.87. If that was payable upon the half-and-half plan, the District would have been required to pay $11,966,775.93, and the total limit of the revenues of the District is only $9,600,000 and some odd. In other words, there is a deficiency right there of $2,000,000, even with the Government carrying out its half-and-half agreement. When these business men were confronted with that they invariably said, "Raise the taxes." Here you find a great shortage in the estimates of $23,000,000.

Let me give you a few reasons why taxes have got to be raised. I am going to quote and put into the RECORD numerous items that, in my judgment, must be taken care of in the city of Washington in the next three or four years—all of it and even more that I have not dared to suggest.

First, there has got to be a new bridge to replace the present bridge across the Potomac River known as Chain Bridge. There is a proposition that is going to cost millions—I can not say how much.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I understood the District had a $4,000,000 surplus. Does that apply?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. We will get along to that later. As I say, there is the Chain Bridge. The next item is a new bridge needed over Rock Creek on the line of Calvert Street to replace the present bridge. Plans have already been authorized for that structure. There have been no estimates yet, but it will cost at least a million and a half dollars. That is aside from the twenty-three millions that I have heretofore stated.

There is a municipal hospital in this bill, with a limit of cost of $1,500,000. Originally the limit of cost was $500,000. The following year we raised it a hundred and some-odd thousand dollars, and kept appropriating until we got $700,000, and that is the present condition. Now, they find they can not build it for less than $1,500,000. So there is $800,000 there to be added on to the $23,000,000.

They want what is called a new Eastern High School, and that will involve at least $1,500,000. Appropriated in this bill and previous bills we have already started with $400,000; in other words, there is $1,100,000 short in that which must come now very soon.

Here is a nice little item. You have seen much of it in the newspapers about our source of water supply. It has got to be increased. So that to increase the source of the water supply, the least possible estimate is $12,000,000. Add that onto this estimate.

Then there is a new site for a plant for the disposal of trash. The new site alone will cost not less than $350,000, to say nothing about the machinery.

The Industrial Home must have a new location. The site which we have looked over will cost $50,000, and the Lord only knows how much the building will cost. It must be done in the very near future.

The school-building program I have already alluded to. That ought to be increased, according to the estimate, about $2,000,000.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. What is the bonded indebtedness of the District of Columbia?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The 3.65 bonds are here. I think they amount to about three or four million. The Government is paying half of this and half of the interest.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Could not a part of this be taken up by bonds of the city?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Now, the gentleman is raising another question. I wish he would go to the legislative committee of the District and figure it out. Do not try to put everything onto the appropriation bill.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I was just asking for information.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. We have got the bill so loaded down now with legislation that it may take a long time to get it through.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Is this deficit in the amount of taxes raised necessary to meet expenses due in any part to undervaluation?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Now, there is another question, a beautiful question, and I wish the gentleman would take that up with the legislative committee and see whether the assessed valuation is proper or whether it is undervalued. We all have ideas and some illustrations, but I do not wish to go on record as saying that that is the case. The matter has been discussed by our committee in the last 24 or 36 hours.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania school children are all supplied with books and materials. Is that customary in the District of Columbia?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think so.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Do they all get books?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think they do.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. I was informed that they did not all get books.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. If the gentleman from Minnesota will pardon me, I can assure the gentleman that they do not.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. In that particular thing the city of Washington does not seem to furnish an example for other cities. Let me ask the gentleman whether the increased appropriation you are asking for for schools would include the purchase of books?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It includes the purchase of books and materials not specified. It was the general opinion that it was to cover all these things; we have increased that very materially this year.

The present rate of taxation in the District of Columbia is 15 mills on the dollar on both real and personal property.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. The levy is only made on two-thirds of the valuation.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I was going to state that. The law reads that it shall be made on the assessed valuation of two-thirds of the cash value of the property.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will notify the gentleman that he has used 35 minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will take 5 or 10 minutes more. As I say, it is $1.50 upon the hundred, both real and personal. The real assessment is based upon a two-thirds valuation of the property. Whether when the assessor makes it up it goes to the limit of two-thirds I am unable to state, although I have heard statements to the contrary.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. I have been interested in this tax question, because I have gotten so much propaganda from the District on the question. I went out here and tried to buy a home. I found that houses selling at $7,500 are taxed about $50, and that houses that went up to $12,500 are taxed about $75. The real estate men argued that the reason for this high value was the very low taxes, and that a man could own his property here and pay a reasonable price for it because he did not have to pay any taxes on it.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. What the gentleman is now telling me is simply cumulative evidence of what I have heard for the last two or three years.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. I would like to know if any committee ever went to work and got what the District people sold property to the Government for in the last two or three years and checked up to find out what taxes were paid on that property, to find out whether it was a few mills or 15 mills.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I would have to refer the gentleman to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which is the legislative committee. Our committee only makes appropriations.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. But talking about the tax question——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Oh, because, owing to the extreme necessity, we have raised the rate in this bill from 15 to 25 mills.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. I think it ought to be raised.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. But there may be some friend of ours sitting on either side of the House who will make the point of order that it is new legislation and out it goes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, how much additional tax does the gentleman figure will be raised by increasing this tax rate?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. About $5,400,000.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. What do you propose to do with that money?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. To spend it for items and things here that I have suggested, running the estimates up, instead of to $23,000,000, to $30,000,000 and odd.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Would it not be better to increase the assessment rather than the rate?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. But how are you going to increase the assessment? The law is there, and if the officers do not carry out the law, how are you going to do it?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. According to the statement of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HARDY], property here is not assessed at two-thirds of its value.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I believe that is correct, and, as I stated, that is cumulative evidence of what we have already heard, but there sits the gentleman up there, Mr. MAPES, who is a very agreeable gentleman, who is the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, a legislative committee, and while I will not say that it is his duty, yet, if the gentleman is interested in that, let him introduce a bill and get it before the Committee on the District of Columbia and thrash that question out there.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It seems to me that that would be the proper way to reach this, instead of raising the tax rate.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I agree with the gentleman, but I am afraid that if he waited to have that done the gentleman would have to wait a long time.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Could you not increase the valuation by a provision in this bill?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Why not?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It is legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. This is legislation also.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. All right; but we have been asked to put on 15 or 20 other legislative matters.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I do not find that the hearings include any consideration of this subject of taxation. Did the committee depend upon the result of former investigations or did it make any independent investigations?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. We have made no independent investigation, but the gentleman was here a while ago when I made this statement. When gentleman of large means would come before our committee and ask to have these extraordinary improvements made, running into the millions, before we would get through we would put the question, "Where are we going to get the money to do it?" Invariably, with one exception, they replied, "Raise our taxes." That is the information that I am talking about, and that is what I am trying to do.

There are many other matters here that I would like to talk about. For instance, take the water service, a very expensive proposition. It has got to be renewed. Twelve million dollars must be put into that. Somebody has got to raise that money. The water system is run upon the theory, and it has worked well until within the last two or three years, that it is self-sustaining. The water users would pay sufficient to run the operation of it, and there is no question but that we have the best water system here and the purest water of any place in the United States, but it is running behind. We have a clause in the bill to raise the water users' rent by 25 per cent. That would just about cover this deficiency which has already arisen. Of course I have quite a number of figures, but I have not the time to put them in now. I believe from the figures that I have that the water users of Washington are paying a lower rate than the water users of any city on this continent, and in many instances four and five times lower than in cities of similar size. That is why we ask to increase the amount by 25 per cent in order to take care of what ought to be done.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, did the committee give any consideration to the improvement of highways leading out of the district? I find that they are in miserable condition.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I know that. We have increased the appropriation quite an amount. There ought to be $2,000,000 spent out there, but where are you going to get the money?

Mr. LINTHICUM. If I were in my own city I would answer the question by saying to issue bonds, and then tax the property for sufficient to pay into a sinking fund and to pay the interest upon the bonds.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is a good suggestion. There are suburban roads leading into this city, but it would take millions to put them into proper condition. We have selected those needing it most, and have increased the amount very liberally over the amount carried in the last bill.

Mr. LAZARO. Does not the gentleman think something ought to be done to utilize this waste of water power up at Great Falls?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think so.

Mr. LAZARO. Would it not be a good idea for the Congress to set an example to the rest of the country right here?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. To appropriate it all out of the Treasury?

Mr. LAZARO. Oh, no; there are different ways of raising the money.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The United States built this aqueduct and virtually gave it to the District of Columbia, the whole thing costing seven or eight millions.

Mr. LAZARO. I am talking about utilizing the water power.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think it is a good plan. I see my friend, Senator NORRIS, over in the Senate, has been advocating that for years. He has come pretty near getting it through, but it has failed up to date. I think that Great Falls ought to be utilized for the District of Columbia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman is correct in saying that that matter is being considered now, not only in reference to the amendment proposed by Senator NORRIS, but in reference to another suggestion that is under advisement, I understand, by the conference committee in charge of the general water-power bill.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It is a matter that should be taken care of.

Mr. FOCHT. Before the gentleman leaves the question of water, how much revenue is derived from water in the District of Columbia?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Well, that is in the hearings.

Mr. SISSON. About $800,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. About $800,000.

Mr. FOCHT. All right, $800,000. I agree with the gentleman that we have pure water here in the District; that is, it is clarified. I do not know what a test will show, but it is surface water that comes from farm lands, some of it from my district and from the coal mines up the Potomac River, and so as to its being the purest water in the world there may be some question. Now, it seems to me that we want to try to apply some of the principles of common sense here and then we will solve some of the difficulties confronting us here in reference to taxation. It is self-evident that some one has been very lax here, to say the least, when it comes to the matter of what we have been charged for water here.

I will bring it down to my own self. I pay for water at home, in Pennsylvania, pure water that comes from watersheds on which there is no habitation, $52 for an unlimited domestic supply. This price is regulated under the supervision of the utilities commission, which rate has been passed upon by men qualified for that purpose, and while too high in Lewisburg it is far too low in Washington. I pay in the city of Washington for an equal amount of consumption between $8 and $10.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman is paying more than some other people are.

Mr. FOCHT. Let me suggest this, that you stop right here and raise that water rent 100 per cent, and that will solve the whole question.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am inclined to think the point of order will be raised against the 25 per cent.

Mr. FOCHT. That is problematical. As a common-sense business proposition, I hope the gentleman will accept the suggestion and instead of 25 per cent make it 100 per cent, and there is another million raised for schools.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If the point of order be not raised and if the gentleman will make a motion to raise it to 100 per cent I think his motion will receive much support on this floor.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If we increase it 100 per cent that will provide the interest and sinking fund on $12,000,000.

Mr. FOCHT. Because the other is complicated. We all understand that this city is a different kind of city from other cities and should be shown a little extra consideration, because it is not a commercial city and should not be subjected to the same taxes as cities that are distinctively commercial cities. But here in reference to this water rent of about 10 per cent of that in other communities it seems to me that they have overlooked a basic, common-sense opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 25 minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will yield the floor for the present.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently there is no quorum present, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 13266, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, and that 242 Members, a quorum, had answered to their names, and that he submitted therewith a list of the absentees for insertion in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

The committeee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is recognized.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in my judgment this is perhaps one of the most important moments in the history of this Republic. I do not believe that there was ever a time since the establishment of the Republic when there were as many new, far-reaching, and important problems to be solved as those which confront us in the immediate future. In the solution of these problems we must not lose sight always of certain fundamental principles. In order that a nation may prosper, in order that a people may be great, in order that you may develop the manhood and womanhood of a nation, Herbert Spencer says it is first necessary that they be well fed, because the basis of all human greatness is physical development. Upon that your moral and intellectual growth is based.

There are certain fundamental principles of political economy that we ought never to lose sight of. Mr. Say, the great French political economist, and Adam Smith, the great Scotchman, divide wealth into three classes. The modern political economist has added another, but Smith and Say both contend that the wealth of a nation, aside from an artificial wealth, which is discussed in a separate class, may be divided into three classes—food, clothing, and building material. Modern political economists have added fuel. Say and Smith both contend that fuel is either artificial food or artificial clothing.

So, gentlemen of the committee, if what they say is true, whatever reduces food, clothing, and building material reduces the wealth of the nation. Whatever increases the amount of food, clothing, and building material increases the wealth of the nation.

Therefore if, as Representatives, we lose sight of these fundamentals in the appropriation of money, in the enactment of legislation, we are losing sight of that fundamental principle of government which will, in the no distant future, cause us to pay an enormous debt for our mistake. Whatever tends to reduce production—the strike, boycott, riot, war, and too many people on the pay roll of the Government—anything that swells the nonproductive list—tends to increase the scarcity of food, clothing, and building material.

I hear a great deal now about the high cost of living. I see many resolutions passed by many and various civic bodies. I hear many "Be it enacteds" in the legislatures of many States and "Be it enacteds" by Congress. I will tell you, gentlemen, you can not solve the problem by "Be it enacted" by law or "Be it resolved" by any civic body of any kind or character. I know of no way to increase the wealth of a nation except upon that basic principle laid down in Genesis, that it is by the sweat of a man's face he must earn his daily bread. I know of no way of producing food except by the cultivation of the soil.

Mr. Buckle says that a nation begins to die when its agriculture begins to wane. When you see a nation with deserted fields, when you see a nation where conditions are such that it is not profitable and pleasant for men to live upon farms, that nation's strength is on the wane. This is what destroyed Rome. It was the scarcity of food that caused the first revolutions which finally resulted in the overthrow of that great Government.

So I do not believe that on the floor of this Congress we ought to "play horse" with this question. We ought to tell the literal truth about it. Congress, in my judgment, can do but little to reduce the high cost of living. When the Democrats were out of power at the time I first came to Congress, I heard a great deal from our side of the House about the high cost of living. We made it one of the campaign issues. It is true that in that campaign was involved the question of the tariff. The Democrats came into power, and I saw no diminution in the price of food, clothing, or building materials. I find a condition here now like that which prevailed when I first came to Congress and when we were then in a minority. I find my Republican friends on the other side of the aisle making as one of the campaign issues the high cost of living.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, you are not going to reduce it that way. When I hear men talking about the high price of the farmers' products, when I hear men dilate with beautiful oratory on the sweet-smelling, upturned sod, about the bursting buds and blossoms, and the zephyrs that blow, the whistle of the boy as he goes to the field astride his mule, of the birds singing in the trees, and other delights of rural life, I ask why it is that these boys are leaving the farms? Why is it that these farms are untenanted?

I will tell you why. It is because the attractions of the city, the white lights, the moving pictures, the brick pavements, are encouraging boys to leave the farms. All of this sweet poetry you have been singing about farm life is by the fellow that rides under an umbrella around to see the other fellow do the work. It is not attractive now to the man who gets the clod in his own shoe, who takes hold of the plow handles himself. Therefore, the problem is one that is going to present some difficulty in solving. Mere resolutions and oratory will not solve it.

I do not know whether we will be able to solve it except by dire necessity and by hard times. But there is one thing I do know, we will not solve it by increasing the governmental expenses; you will not solve it by increasing the number of people that get on the pay roll of the Government nor by increasing salaries. The more people who get on the pay roll of the Federal Government, the more people who go in the consuming class and leave the producing class, the more enormous is going to be the high cost of living.

Now, that which causes people to engage in a particular line of business, causes people to spend their time and energy and labor along certain lines of industry, is due to the fact that a man realizes that he will get some reward for his labor. A few years ago the Irish potato was selling for $2 a peck, $8 a bushel. During that time, in the Irish-potato section of the United States, the fence corners were plowed up and planted in Irish potatoes, and in the spring potatoes went down to 60 cents a peck. Why? Because it was remunerative for men to plant Irish potatoes.

So, gentlemen of the committee, whatever is doing in the way of legislation, what is done to prevent monopolizing the market, what is done to prevent men from controlling the market places, will primarily depend upon what primary food or commodities are to be controlled.

Men do not go into the market to control the price of corn when there is vastly more corn than will be consumed normally in the coming season. Men do not make corners on the cotton crop when we have a vast cotton acreage that whitens under the stars, producing something like three-quarters of a bale of cotton per acre. It is only when it is scarce that men do it; and I do not care what sort of legislation you pass, you can not compel a man who owns 500 bushels of corn and has it in his crib to sell the product of his toil at a less price than he is willing to accept. No good government would force a man to sell the product of his toil. You can not condemn his property except for war purposes, and that only when he is compensated for it. It is also true that if you desired to buy a certain amount of corn because you believe corn will advance in price, you would paralyze industry and trade if you by law prevented that. So that if Congress will do those things that will solve this problem, you must pursue that course that will relieve of unnecessary burdens those people who are engaged in the productive pursuits of life. You can not help the situation by enlarging the powers of government and increasing Federal employees.

It is only necessary for a man to get on a train and ride in any direction from Washington a comparatively few miles to see the untenanted fields. You at once know the cause of the high cost of living. And yet there is a school of politics that imagines that you can get together and by their boot straps lift people over these hard places in life. It can not be done that way. I hear ministers preaching on the text, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." I do not know that they preach too much about it, and I do not condemn them for it, but commend them; but I have never heard a minister of the gospel preach a sermon from the words following that text, "Six days shalt thou labor." I have listened in vain to hear it, and yet one command is just as positive as the other; and if that second clause of that commandment were observed by us all there would be plenty for everyone. In my judgment, you are pandering to certain demands of the soap-box orator, and by doing that will cause us infinitely more trouble than any other one propaganda in America.

I hear people talk about "every man being entitled to a living wage." I deny it. No man is entitled as a matter of right to a living wage. Every man is entitled to what he earns. If every man were entitled to a living wage, the man in the shoe factory who makes the equivalent of 2 pairs of shoes a day might eat more than the man who would make the equivalent of 10 pairs of shoes, and yet if you gave the man who makes 2 pairs of shoes the same wage as the man who makes 10 pairs of shoes it will not be long before every man in the factory will be making only 2 pairs of shoes a day instead of 10. In other words, you must reward men in accordance with their efficiency and their capacity to produce. Therefore, there is a great deal of this modern bolshevistic, socialistic policy that I take no stock in. There are too many doctrinaires in this country.

What we need in this Republic is to get back to fundamental principles. Let us quit "playing horse" with each other. If you do not do it, and those of us who agree on great political principles can not get together, if we continue to divide in name merely, if we continue to divide because we have been associating with a certain crowd all the time, and there is no principle that prompts us to action, then, indeed, the balance of power will be held by people who do not hold the fundamental doctrines that will preserve this Republic and save this constitutional Government of ours.

I do not believe that there was ever struck off by mortal man a more marvelously magnificent system of government, provided every man in it is willing to do his full duty, provided he is willing to labor and toil and deserve success, than that wonderful instrument that we hear so little about these days—the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.] That instrument is the palladium of your liberty and mine. It is an ark of the covenant of the rights of the poor and the rights of the humble. In that instrument every man finds all the protection that a good man wants, and God knows it is all that a bad man should ever have. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen of the committee, I believe that as Republicans and Democrats we may carry this Government rapidly, radically into a socialistic trend, and do it unwittingly. Every time the Government of the United States or a State government goes into a line of endeavor, thereby adding to its pay roll to become a charge against the taxpayers, unless it is performing a proper function of government, something that ought to be performed by the Government rather than by private individuals, then to that extent you have socialized the Republic. I do not believe, for example, in the Government ownership of railroads. The Government ownership of railroads is the first long step toward socialism. When you say, "I believe in the Government ownership of railroads," then it becomes necessary, follows as the night the day, that you also have the control of those instrumentalities necessary to operate the railroads. You can not operate the railroads unless you own or control the coal mines; and if you own the coal mines, then you must have all the instrumentalities necessary to operate them. Where will it end? In my judgment our Government was intended only, as conceived by our fathers, to give to every man in this Republic a fair, equal opportunity to develop himself in accordance with those powers which God has given him. If he is energetic, if he is wise, if he is thrifty, if he is economical, he will succeed. If he is unwise, if he is thriftless, if he is extravagant, he will not succeed. So that government which rewards endeavor makes the best citizenship on earth, but that government which taxes endeavor for the purpose of rewarding people who do not make any endeavor is a government of special privilege and will not live long in the minds and hearts of a people who can and will make a nation great.

Now, I would like to talk to you very much longer on this line, but I am not going to do it, except to say that wherever a community lives absolutely out of any treasury it is most difficult to get those people to realize the fundamentals as to how wealth is produced and where wealth comes from. Nothing so quickly corrupts the minds of a people as to permit them to enjoy a special privilege. The privilege soon ripens, in their minds, into a right. They soon lose their intellectual integrity and their capacity to think fairly, correctly, and honestly. For example, the citizens of the District of Columbia have long enjoyed an exemption from taxation which no other city or community in America has enjoyed. Half of their taxes have been paid out of the Federal Treasury since 1878, and they now think it a crime to require them to pay as much taxes for what they enjoy as other people have to pay. They will not consider the burden of taxation in other cities; instead, they now insist that these cities and counties and States should be taxed in addition to their already great burdens a portion of the expenses of the District, even when their present taxes are about three times what they pay here in the District.

Now, in the District of Columbia they have the best pay roll of any people in the United States. In every city in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, or any State in this Union, the pay rolls are affected by the weather conditions, by crop conditions, by panics and failures. That is true everywhere except in the city of Washington. As long as the people are able to pay their taxes, the strong arm of the tax gatherer goes out and gathers in the millions of dollars that are expended here every month. They have a fixed return. They have a fixed number of people who purchase the things they have to sell from the salaries they get out of the taxpayers of the United States.

It is natural that there should grow up in the minds of the people of the District of Columbia the idea that the man in Congress who desires to close the door of the Treasury against them is an enemy of the District of Columbia. I have been held up as an enemy of the District of Columbia for a number of years. Now, gentlemen, I deny it. On the contrary, I would not tax the people of the District of Columbia one penny more than is just and fair; and if a Congressman should lend himself to an unfair tax rate against the people of the District of Columbia, who are not represented here, I should think that, to say the least, there was some little political cowardice in that man. But, on the other hand, I say that until our friends in the District of Columbia pay a reasonable tax we are not just and fair to the constituents whom we represent when we go into the Federal Treasury for their benefit. [Applause.]

If this bill goes through, I want to congratulate the chairman of the subcommittee having it in charge. I think there has been more real constructive thought, more real constructive legislation, put into this bill that will start a new relationship between the District of Columbia and the Federal Treasury than in any previous bill, and that it will not only result in great good to the Treasury but will result in great good to the District of Columbia.

Now, what is a just and fair tax? That is a thing most difficult to determine. But do you know of any fairer way to determine what is reasonable than to ascertain what people voluntarily tax themselves where they have the right to expend the money for themselves? What are men willing to give for certain municipal, county, and State improvements in the various communities throughout the United States? Take into consideration the population of those cities, and when you find a city of about the population of Washington that taxes itself for its necessities, it means that the people consider themselves fairly taxed; and if we do not tax the people of the District of Columbia as heavily as those people tax themselves, then we have certainly done the people of the District of Columbia no injury. When we have fixed the amount that is a fair contribution from the taxpayers of the District of Columbia, then we ought to say that that is all they shall pay, and if we want to go on record with our constituents at home as being in favor of beautifying the Government property here, and spend as many millions of dollars as we please for that purpose, that responsibility is with us and we have done no man an injustice.

What have your committee done here? After a good deal of discussion we finally reached a compromise as to the amount. In order that you may understand exactly what we are doing, you must not only take into consideration the rate of taxation but you must take into consideration the assessment. If the assessment of property in a city is very high you may have just as great taxes with a low tax rate as you have in a city where the assessment is very low and the tax rate is high. The amount paid on the property might be the same, although one city would show a low rate and the other a higher rate. You have got to go behind that rate and ascertain what the assessment is.

Now, what is the assessment here? At various times in the past I have investigated it. I have been on this committee for a number of years, unwillingly. It has been wished on me. Being on the committee I have tried to do my duty as I could see it. I have investigated as many assessments as I could, and I will tell you a few incidents that have come before this committee.

One gentleman came into the committee accompanied by a Member of the House. He said, "They are endeavoring to take my property out here for additional ground for a school building. They estimate my property to be worth about $7,500.

That is entirely too little." Col. Kutz, one of the commissioners, was there; we asked him how the commissioners arrived at that figure. He said, "This man's property is assessed at $5,000. Under the rule of assessment if you add 50 per cent to that, it will make $7,500." This gentleman stated that his property was worth $15,000, and he produced a statement from a real estate man who is supposed to understand values in the District of Columbia who certified that the property was worth not less than $14,000, and that $15,000 would not be an unfair value for it. That is when you go to take it away from him. When he pays taxes on it he pays taxes on $5,000. I know some Members of Congress, whose names I will not call, who have invested a certain number of dollars in property in the city of Washington, and so far as I have inquired they say they pay on about the same assessment that they pay on property at home, and one gentleman said he paid four times as much per dollar on property at home. That is, he paid four times as much on each dollar invested as he did here. So I think it is fair to say that the property in the District of Columbia is assessed about as we assess property at home. It is not assessed at its full value. In my judgment it is not assessed at 50 per cent of its value, because if you go out and try to buy property for 50 per cent more than it is assessed for you will buy but little property. The assessment law provides that property shall be valued at its full valuation but that the assessment of taxes shall be on the basis of two-thirds of the valuation. But if their property is assessed at one-half of its value, and then if you levy 1½ per cent upon two-thirds of the one-half valuation, you will get a rate of very much less than 1 per cent on the actual value. But giving them the benefit of every doubt, and presuming that the assessment is two-thirds of the value, then they are only paying 1 per cent on the real value. I happen to know about the city of Memphis. They pay 4½ per cent, and the property is assessed at 80 per cent of its value. Last year I wrote to 40 different cities, larger than Washington and smaller than Washington, and I found the rule to be, taking into consideration both the rate of taxation and the rule of assessment, that the State, county, and municipal taxes paid by the people of the cities of the United States are in round figures about three times what is paid per dollar on the value of property in the city of Washington. I think that is a fair statement.

Now, your committee after deliberation have added 1 per cent, which, provided the assessment is two-thirds of the actual value, will amount to 1.66⅔ per cent tax on tangible personal property and on real estate.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. BEE. As a matter of fact, there being no difference between State, county, and municipal taxes in the city of Washington, as in other municipalities, States, and counties, 2½ per cent is infinitely less that the taxpayer has to pay here than in the States where there are county and municipal taxes.

Mr. SISSON. That is true. I was coming to that; but you can not take all of these things in in one statement. In nearly every State in the United States the citizen pays all sidewalk and all street taxes in front of his property. In addition to that he pays all the expenses of laying the water sewers and mains.

Mr. BEE. And they do not do that in the District?

Mr. SISSON. No; the property owner pays one half and the two treasuries pay the other half. In other words, if the gentleman and I live on opposite sides of the same street, we pay for one half of the sidewalk and the two treasuries pay for the other half. In my own town we pay it all, and if we get water put into the house we pay the expenses of laying the pipes.

These are the privileges of the people of the District of Columbia which the people do not have in other cities.

Now, if I am your servant I have got to tell you gentlemen the true facts here and then leave it to you and your good judgment and your good heart and conscience as to what is right and what ought to be done. Your committee recommend a method of assessment of two-thirds value and a tax of 2½ per cent.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. SANFORD. Has the committee taken into consideration at all the comparison of rent on a given valuation in the District of Columbia and elsewhere?

Mr. SISSON. We did not at this time.

Mr. SANFORD. Does not the gentleman think that the rates are higher here than they are elsewhere?

Mr. SISSON. I did make some investigation when the bill was up before. I do not think it is fair to the District to make that comparison now, because at that time there was a congested population here and the people were able to rent their property for almost any figure they pleased, so much so that we had to pass a law to prevent profiteering in rents. Therefore, as to the people of the District of Columbia we naturally would recognize that they acted within the law; but I did make a comparison as to the rent of apartment houses in this city and in the city of New York, where, probably, the rates are and ought to be higher. I found that the rate was higher in the city of Washington than it was in like accommodations in the city of New York.

Now, it was charged here on this floor by the chairman of the District Committee, and never denied, that there was an organization here where they had fixed the rental of property, and rather than let the property be rented at less than the fixed rental they let it lie vacant. I do not know of my own knowledge whether that was true or not, but I have heard no denial of it. In other words, if there were 100 business houses in the city, or 100 rooms and 101 people wanted a room, you would have no trouble in raising your rent all down the line. But if there were 100 rooms and only 99 people that wanted them, some fellow's room would have to go vacant, and therefore they would say to the man whose room was vacant we will keep the rent up and the organization will pay you the regular rent of your room and we will all make more money. That was charged here on the floor. I do not say that it is true, but I do know that if you go now and try to rent an apartment you will be paralyzed at the amount of rent you would have to pay.

Mr. SANFORD. We are.

Mr. BEE. General paralysis.

Mr. SISSON. Now, there is this to be said, with this enormous pay roll that you have in the District of Columbia, when a man gets on the pay roll his rent is certain and sure because every month he gets his pay. The result is that there are less people who have to call upon the landlord to give them sufferance by virtue of the fact that they are out of a job—less of that in Washington than in other cities of the United States, take it from year to year.

Now, if what your committee have recommended is carried out the people of the District of Columbia will pay on a reasonable valuation from 1.50 to 1.66⅔ per cent. I feel sure that I am right in saying that that is half a per cent less than is paid in any city of like size in the United States.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. GARD. I am interested in this matter, and I would like to have the benefit of the gentleman's analysis. How did the committee arrive at the fact that 1 per cent would be the proper increase?

Mr. SISSON. As far as the committee was concerned it was rather arbitrary. We took into consideration what other cities were paying. As I stated, an investigation was made and the members of the committee were not identical with the committee that did make the investigation of the taxes in forty-odd cities. But taking that into consideration we were sure that the people were paying less in the District than they were in other cities.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. DUNBAR. Is it intended to charge personal property 2½ per cent?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; on tangible property. Washington is a delightful place for the tax dodger on choses in action. At home in most cities a man is compelled to pay on those, as he does on everything else, but when he comes to Washington he has to return the choses in action, but he pays only three-tenths of 1 per cent. Until this committee put it in the bill, for years they did not pay anything on choses in action.

By the way, the man who got up Postum Cereal came down here and built a house, stayed here long enough to make himself a resident, nailed his house up, and went back home. His case got into the courts, and the courts held that his vast personal estate could not be taxed for the inheritance tax at home, because he was a citizen of the District of Columbia. It was not taxed here, so he escaped taxation at home, where he had made this fortune.

Mr. DUNBAR. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the tax on personal property has been three-tenths of 1 per cent?

Mr. SISSON. That is on invisible personal property. They have a division of property here in the District of Columbia called tangible and intangible personal property. For instance, goods on the shelves and household goods over and above $1,000 are visible property and subject to taxation, and they are taxed like real estate.

Mr. DUNBAR. Would bank stock be considered tangible or intangible?

Mr. SISSON. Intangible.

Mr. DUNBAR. And that would pay a tax of three-tenths of 1 per cent?

Mr. SISSON. Yes. I have talked too long on that end of it, because I do not believe that the practical experience of business men in this body will have any sort of doubt as to the tax rate that we place here being reasonable. What is the necessity for doing this? I do not believe the Federal Government ought to contribute more than eight or ten million dollars in any one year to this District government under anything like present conditions. What is needed now in the District? The business men that the chairman of the committee [Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota] talked to you about came before the committee. How were they selected? How did they get here? The hearings will show that they represented from 25 to 30, perhaps more than that number, different organizations, I have forgotten how many——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. More than that—40 or 50.

Mr. SISSON. Various kinds of business, social, and other organizations, which represented, as they said, practically the entire population, both colored and white, of the District of Columbia. They sent representatives to a meeting here to discuss the needs of the District of Columbia. Those organizations having sent those delegates, selected certain gentlemen to come up before this committee, and the real representatives of the city of Washington, men of means, as Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota told you, men of affairs, men of vast property interests here, stated that the crowd here who said they represented the people of the District, who did not want to pay taxes, did not represent the real views of the people of the District of Columbia, that they realized that if they got all of these conveniences and got all of these necessities, so as to keep pace with other cities, they would have to do as the people in other cities had to do, go down in their pockets and pay for it.

They came clamoring that the school-teachers' salaries be raised even higher than we have raised them here, and we fixed the lowest school-teacher's pay, the first day she entered the schoolhouse, at $1,440 a year. The average as the lowest in any one grade is, in round figures, when you take the longevity pay of those who have been in for several years into consideration, $1,560 for 10 school months. Search through all of the cities in the United States and you will find that, irrespective of population, with a single exception of the superintendents in those cities of millions of people and certain principals in certain schools which are infinitely larger than those of the city of Washington, the pay here is not only up with the average, but there are but one or two cities in the United States where the salaries are comparable with ours in the grades. If you calculate to pay during the months that they work, at 20 days a month, the lowest salary paid is $144 a month, and the average of the lowest paid teacher will be $156 per month. If you take an average of 40 children to each teacher and divide the number of children in the United States by 40, you would get the number of teachers reasonably needed to teach them. Multiply that by $1,560 a year, for 10 months' work, and you will find that it goes up into a stupendous sum. There is a limit which people can pay even for the education of their children. When you shall have reached that limit ,to go above it is to finally destroy prosperity. The people can only stand so much taxation. I do not believe you will get better teachers either by such extravagant salaries, for I do not think any man or woman was ever a good school-teacher who went into the schoolroom for the purpose of making money.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does the gentleman refer to the salaries that are now paid or the salaries proposed in this bill?

Mr. SISSON. Proposed in this bill.

Mr. BEE. I notice, on page 36, pay fixed at $1,200 each. Is that without the bonus?

Mr. SISSON. That does not include the bonus.

Mr. BEE. And you contemplate the bonus?

Mr. SISSON. The bonus has already been put in in the Senate.

Mr. BEE. That would make the amount $1,440.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; you must add the $240 bonus.

Mr. SNYDER. The figures that the gentleman has been using include the bonus?

Mr. SISSON. I said that; in this bill.

Mr. SNYDER. Then, in the bill the figures the gentleman has been quoting——

Mr. SISSON. Include the bonus. Take the city of St. Louis, and where we pay the teachers $1,200 a year here they pay them $860. Some of the far western cities pay the teachers in the beginning about what is carried in this bill, and so do Detroit and Philadelphia; and, by the way, it is only within the last year or two that those cities have done that.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. According to the tax rate as proposed in this bill, how much will that relieve the Congress from appropriating for the care of this District out of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. SISSON. For the next two years, in my judgment, it will not relieve it of one dollar. I will explain that later; but I was endeavoring to enumerate the items for which the people of the District of Columbia were willing to have their taxes increased; that is, the representatives who came before the committee. The first was to get adequate pay for the school-teachers. The second was to get adequate school buildings here.

Mr. MILLER. Does each one of these school-teachers draw this bonus of $240?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. And that is added to the salary that is the basis of this bill?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Then that $240 of the school-teacher's salary, as well as all other employees of the District, represents an amount no part of which the inhabitants of the District pay?

Mr. SISSON. That is correct.

Mr. MILLER. And they have that advantage over the citizens of any other American city?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; and I am glad the gentleman suggested that; but there are so many little odds and ends, as Mr. DAVIS stated in his opening remarks, where expenses properly charged to the District are carried in other bills, that it would take too long a story to pick them all out. There is a longevity pay. The second year the teachers are engaged they get longevity pay for each year for at least five years. There is an additional pay to all of this. The principals of the schools get an additional bonus a year for each room that they have in the school. In other words, if they have eight rooms they get $240. That is in addition to the bonus, if the salary is under $2,500, so that there are so many angles to this thing that it is difficult to tell what the school-teacher gets; and I think the chairman will bear me out in the statement that they never have yet found an auditor who was able to tell how much money we have to appropriate for longevity pay, because it is constantly changing all of the time.

But let us go back to what I started to tell you. Now, when we made an appropriation for school buildings several years ago to take care of those needs in the District of Columbia we made an appropriation of an amount that the engineer commissioner said was enough to pay for the buildings. The war came on in Europe before we got into the war. They tried to let those bids, not a single school building was built, and they came back to our committee and made a second estimate for an additional amount. We gave them that. They advertised and did not get a single bid within that amount. Then, by that time we had gotten into the war. Then the War Board was organized and, irrespective of how much money we would have given them, they could not build because there was inhibition upon securing the material, and not only that, but they could not get the labor. Then in order that the children of the District might not suffer, your committee got together with the board of education and made a calculation as to the number of children then needing school facilities and we built what are called portable buildings—and by the way they had some trouble in getting the War Board to give the lumber to build those buildings with—and in that way endeavored to take care of the children, and by the way if you will look at the portable buildings they are better school buildings than many Congressmen went to school in. We do not think that always the character of a school building indicates the character of the boy turned out. All of those portable buildings are full because it was estimated at the outbreak of the war that we had about 365,000 population here. The census now shows 455,000, or something like over 85,000 added to the population. Now, of these school buildings authorized several years ago not a building had been completed, not one, because they could not be built, and but for these portable buildings there would have been a distressing condition here.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. BEE. What is the condition in Washington now with reference to school facilities? Are the children being put upon the half day because we have not sufficient accommodations?

Mr. SISSON. In some.

Mr. BEE. What is the reason?

Mr. SISSON. Because there is not enough school room. They have rented churches; they have rented any temporary quarters they could get in the neighborhood of the school.

Mr. BEE. Is it in the power of Congress by proper legislation to correct that?

Mr. SISSON. We can not, unless they have more money than the law allows the District Commissioners to estimate for.

Mr. BRIGGS. How many new buildings are contemplated here now?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know. The hearings show, I think, about seven or eight.

Mr. BRIGGS. Have they provided enough to take care of these graded schools and high schools?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. There are not sufficient to relieve the congestion.

Mr. SISSON. No.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They ought to have more.

Mr. SISSON. Yes. In other words, these advocates of the half and half must come and admit it has fallen down completely. I will tell you what we can do. If Congress should determine to-morrow that we will pay out of the Federal Treasury our part of it and we will levy taxes sufficient to raise $12,000,000—and, by the way, that is the last estimate to give this city plenty of water—you would hear a howl going up from the taxpayers. Why? Because we could make the tax so great that the Federal Treasury might stand it, but we could bankrupt these people in Washington.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. IGOE. Does not the gentleman think it very important that there should be a general plan formulated now to take care of this school situation?

Mr. SISSON. Yes. That is what we have done in this bill, and, if passed, it will be amply cared for. Your committee will guarantee it will be amply cared for if this Congress will give the committee what it has planned here for the District, and the District and the people of the United States will, in my judgment, be thankful to the chairman of this committee for bringing in this bill, and, in my opinion, he will have done the country and this District a great service, and the business men who came before the committee said that is the only thing to do, and we can not do it under the present law, because the District Commissioners under the law are inhibited from making an estimate of more than double the amount of the revenues of one year.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. FESS. Is this increased demand for school facilities permanent?

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely—that is, as permanent as in any city. The testimony before our committee shows it is permanent.

Mr. FESS. And is not temporary?

Mr. SISSON. No. We went into this matter, and, of course, all these things are problematical. The people who come with families and take up their residence here, in our judgment, can be held to be as permanent as the residents of other cities. Now, as to this number of Government employees, young ladies and gentlemen who come here and have gotten upon the pay roll of the Government and do not have any school children——

Mr. FESS. So the 100,000 increase of population does not mean that they are families?

Mr. SISSON. No; not that. The truth of the business is that if we have 100,000 population with school children that would swamp all the school facilities here.

Mr. MILLER. This is along the line which the present speaker has been advocating for years?

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely. I think we have it in a better shape in this bill than it has ever been because the conditions are such that they demanded just exactly what has been brought in by the committee in this bill. Now, I have shown the necessity of more taxes by enumerating the school-teachers and the salary increase for the policemen and firemen and the increase of the other salaries in the District of Columbia and the needed school buildings, all running into millions. Then the District of Columbia has grown so enormously that there is a vast area of territory that is not sidewalked nor paved nor sewered which is enormous. But now we are also at the danger point, and I want every Member of Congress to hear this—we are at the danger point in reference to the water supply. Of course, if nothing happens, if we have no accidents, and if we do not have too many fires in the city at different places at the same time the present facilities and capacity will take care of it, but if they should have several fires or an extraordinarily great fire it will be utterly impossible to supply this city with water, as has been stated.

Why, last summer it got down to the point—of course, there were more people here then than there are now—but the consumption of water got to the point last summer that but for the opportunity of accumulating the supply all night they would not have had enough to run until the next evening.

Mr. BEE. The gentleman from Missouri wanted me to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if the prohibition amendment had not increased the water consumption in Washington? [Laughter.]

Mr. SISSON. Probably it did; and I understand from the best authorities that the increase in the use of water is healthy to the human system as well as to the human soul. [Applause.]

Now, as I stated, the District of Columbia has got to be in a position to meet its part not only in building this additional water system, from above the falls to the city of Washington, but it has got to be ready to meet the increased expenses of the service mains and principal mains of the water system out into areas that have been built up lately. The people here are now clamoring to have streets paved, and there is no money with which to pave them. Under the present law it can not be obtained. You hear a man ask, "Why not appropriate that $4,000,000 of surplus?" I looked into that. There are some Members of Congress who are good lawyers, and there are good lawyers on this committee who contend, and with good reason, that money collected in the way it is collected goes into the Treasury in the way of miscellaneous receipts. I do not share that view, although you might argue that on the face and letter of the law, because I believe, irrespective of the letter of the law, Congress is going to do the right thing.

I do not believe that there is a Member who will say that, if under the half-and-half arrangement the District of Columbia has paid $4,000,000 more in the past few years than has been appropriated, the Federal Government is not willing to appropriate that for the District. But put that all in, and yet the District of Columbia would be short $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 a year to pay for what is absolutely needed at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman from Texas give me 10 minutes more?

Mr. BUCHANAN. All right.

Mr. SISSON. Now, there is the price of labor. Let me give you an illustration: Those people who clean the streets, the laborers called "white wings," their wages before the war were $1.75 a day of eight hours. They now get $3.57½ a day, more than a hundred per cent increase, and I asked Col. Lovering, who was here at the time, "Colonel, will you please tell me how much less work they do now than when they got $1.75?" He laughed and said, "You do not think that is et sequitur, do you?" I said, "Yes." He said, "That is one thing I can tell you accurately, because we have a certain number of streets to clean every week and certain men are required to do it. They clean now 60 per cent of what they cleaned when they got $1.75 a day."

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. BRIGGS. As to this increase of taxation, it is on the basis of 50-50?

Mr. SISSON. Oh, no. In other words, you will not catch me in that trap. Another thing. There are a great many people complaining because personal property of intangible character is not taxed. Do you know why? It is perhaps because we were then getting as much or more money than we needed, and every time you add a dollar under this system—that is, add a dollar to the District taxes—Uncle Sam is called upon to match it. He will not do it if I can help it. Let me show you how absurd it would be. Suppose this were a city of 10,000,000 people, like the city of London. Does any Member contend we ought to pay half of the taxes of such a great city? On the other hand, suppose you had 20,000 or 30,000 people here outside of those connected with the Government. Do you contend, when we were in the woods, that the first man that moved in would have to pay half of the expense? The only reason Congress ever agreed to the half-and-half was because the District was bankrupt. Negro suffrage and feather-duster legislatures had given the District people such a bad and extravagant government that there was over $40,000,000 of indebtedness. The debt was due and no one would buy the bonds and the city then only had a little over 100,000 people. To pay such a debt meant bankruptcy. So the Federal Government stepped in, feeling a moral responsibility for the weakness of that government, and agreed to refund the bonds at 3.65 and pay one-half of the debt out of the Treasury. She has paid $22,000,000 and the interest from 1878 down to the present time, which is over $18,000,000, making a gift to the people of the District of Columbia of over $40,000,000. This debt Congress had nothing to do with creating. She must do that, because the bondholders took the refund bonds with the understanding that they were secured by the United States.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman tell me how the Government is going to escape matching these dollars here?

Mr. SISSON. Let Congressmen like my friend from Texas get right and vote to repeal that very wicked "half-and-half law." But I will not discuss that, because it has been discussed here so much.

Mr. BRIGGS. The House has passed that, but it is not an act of Congress yet.

Mr. SISSON. It is in this bill, and we have proposed it along with other legislation. If the gentleman will help us, we may be able to get somewhere toward relieving the people of our districts of some of this burden. And I think it is fair to say that unless this legislation goes into this bill many items should be cut out or the Federal Treasury will pay more than its half under the present law.

Mr. McKEOWN. The gentleman said that it would cause water waste to increase the water supply and decrease the cost to the city. How is this done now? Are the water rates fixed by the District Commissioners in the city?

Mr. SISSON. The water rates are fixed for the consumer by the District Commissioners. If I had time I would like to discuss that. With the exception of two or three of what are called "Lake cities," up on the Great Lakes, the water in the District of Columbia is not only cheaper, but much cheaper, than any like city in the world. For instance, the same amount of water in most of the cities that the District pays $4.50 for here will cost about $16 to $24.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. And who fixes those rates?

Mr. SISSON. The District Commissioners. They could raise them if they wanted to do so.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It is according to the organic act of 1878.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. And Congress has no control over those rates?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; Congress, of course, can control the whole matter. We took the estimate of the District Commissioners that they needed about $200,000 more than they were now getting, and we asked to increase the rate 25 per cent in order to raise that much money.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Even if you raised it 100 per cent, it would be the cheapest water in the United States.

Mr. SISSON. I think that is true, with the exception of the Lake cities.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And it would extend the water mains.

Mr. BRIGGS. How much waste is there in the water supply of the District; and if these prices were increased would it not tend to conserve the use of water?

Mr. SISSON. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that. There are a great many cities that wanted to increase the use of water because it is healthy, but they found if they made the water rates too cheap people wasted the water. Therefore, if you make them pay for the water they waste, they get careful as to the use of it. I pay $60 or $70 a year for about the same amount of water the people pay $4.50 for here.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does the United States Government pay for its use of water here?

Mr. SISSON. The Government does not; no.

Now, in reference to the increase for laying mains, we took just exactly what Col. Kutz says it cost to lay the mains per foot. Under the present law the amount was fixed at a time when it would cover it, but the cost of material has gone up, and labor has gone up, so that if Congress passes the legislation carried in this bill Washington will then get cheaper water and cheaper mains than any other city. If you do not carry this legislation, but leave it where it is, Washington will be the only city in the United States where the rate of taxation has not been greatly increased in the last few years. It is the only city where the rate of taxation is less now than it was in 1878.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman spoke about the Government not paying any water rent. I will explain that in a second. The Government built the original water plant here at a cost of between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000, and the people of the District here, in order to recompense the Government, are supposed to pay 5 per cent on that investment, but they do not pay it; they just let the Government use the water, and at the rate the Government is using it now the Government is paying a higher rate than anybody.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; that is true. That was done when Jefferson Davis was Secretary of War, and the original cost of about $8,000,000 was paid wholly out of the Treasury of the United States. The District paid nothing, and it was arranged that if the District was permitted to use the water and not put up a separate plant that the Government could get its water free. If this had not been done, the District would have had to issue bonds to build a plant.

In 1878, when these people taxed themselves, the District expenses were only $1,594,158.38. That was the last tax roll where the people, through their own representatives, taxed themselves. What was the amount in the next year, 1879, after Congress got control of it and agreed to pay one-half? The budget jumped up to $3,082,602.17. In other words, it nearly doubled. But when you had at that time 160,000 population the expenses of the District of Columbia were only $3,000,000. Now your population has increased less than three times that number, and on the same ratio the expenses of this city government, like that of other cities, ought not to be more than $10,000,000, or at the outside more than $12,000,000, and yet we carry over $18,000,000 in this bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And at the time they were spending a million dollars a year carriages were being stuck in the mud on Pennsylvania Avenue between here and the White House, and there were no paved streets or pavements or sidewalks anywhere. I was not here, but I have read the reminiscences of people who were here.

Mr. SISSON. That only impresses you with the fact that people can put up with bad streets without complaint when they pay the taxes themselves, but they will not do it if they can get it out of the Federal Treasury. They raise a howl about bad streets when they are better than any city in the world. [Applause.] As long as they have the Federal Treasury to draw upon, they can not get along without the best. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, in conclusion, I want to urge upon you to give some thought to the suffering taxpayers of the districts you represent when you vote upon the items in this bill. Do not forget the folks back home. Remember that under the present wicked "half-and-half" system, each congressional district pays on an average of about $3,000 each year to the support of the purely local improvements here in Washington. Do you suppose that your own constituents know that you are voting out of the Federal Treasury one-half of the costs of schools here; that this amounts to over a million a year alone; that they pay one-half of the salary of every policeman; that they pay for one-half of the salary of every fireman and one-half of the cost of every fire engine, chemical engine, hook and ladder, and fire-engine house?

Do they know that the Federal Treasury pays one-half of the cost of every schoolbook used by the school children here?

Do they know that one-fourth of the costs of all the sidewalks and streets is paid out of the Federal Treasury?

Do they know that the Federal Treasury pays one-half of the costs of maintaining these streets and sidewalks after they are laid?

Do they know that one-half of every salary of every officer, clerk, laborer, and employee of the District government is paid out of the Federal Treasury?

Do they know that one-half of the money to care for all the poor and insane in all the institutions of this District is paid out of the Federal Treasury?

Do they know that one-half of the costs of every school building, courthouse, hospital, and jail, costing many millions of dollars, is paid out of the Federal Treasury?

Do they know that the tax rate here is about one-third of what they pay at home and that you are by your votes filching out of their pockets millions of dollars every year to pay taxes for these people here in the District who are better able to pay than any people in the United States?

Do they know that money in bank notes, mortgages, and so forth, of the rich here only pay three-tenths of 1 per cent, while in most States they are taxed like other property?

Do they know that here in the District many privilege taxes paid in their own towns are not paid by people in the same business here?

Do they know that those of us in Congress who want these people here in the District to pay a fair tax are called unfair in the local press and criticized very unjustly for that reason alone?

Do they know that when a Congressman or Senator buys property here in the District that he pays about one-third of what he would pay on the same investment at home?

Do they know that for the last six years the House of Representatives has by an overwhelming vote abolished this "half-and-half" system and that each time it has gone to another body in this Capitol and that in that body they insist that the people back home should pay half of all the expenses of this city?

If the newspapers outside of Washington would tell the exact news to the people at home and be half as active to give the truth as the Washington press is to suppress the truth and keep Senators in the dark and in line for the wicked "half-and-half," the people by their votes would teach their servants up here who betray their interest to do so but once. Their voice would be heard by these men who thus betray them and with an avalanche of ballots would leave them at home and send some here who would represent their interest. The trouble is that the people at home do not know what is going on here in this District.

This whole system is bad and vicious. It corrupts the mind of everyone who falls under its influence. They soon feel that the Federal Treasury owes them all they can get out of it. Every wile known to designing men has grown to a science and a profession here, and they know exactly how to manipulate Congress to get what they want. They know the weakness and vanities and selfishness of men in public life. They make it as unpleasant as they can for the man who is against their special graft. I, with a few others, have fought this for years, and at first it looked to us a hopeless task even in the House, but now the House by overwhelming majorities has repeatedly registered its will against this graft and will do so again. What is needed is a few men whose eyes can be opened in another body.

When men in public office forget that they are servants of the people and forget the simple toil of the great mass, then such men are dangerous in public office. Let us in the House do no wrong to any person or interest in the District of Columbia, but let us also preserve our mental poise and say to them: "You shall pay your just burden of tax. This and this only shall be required of you. But you shall no longer fatten upon the Federal Treasury by escaping your just burden and casting it upon the shoulders of those people who have trusted us with their ballots to represent them in this body." Let us do right ourselves, and it must follow as the night the day we can not then be false to any man.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the Congress, legislation is being urged in Congress fixing upon the country a system of compulsory military training in times of peace as well as in times of war. The Senate Committee on Military Affairs have reported favorably such a proposition. There are numerous bills pending on the subject, all pointing in the same direction of having compulsory military training as a fixed policy of the United States. As one who supported the war from beginning to end, as one who voted every dollar the Nation needed and supported every law that would bring early success to our armies, I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not in favor of compulsory military training, and I want to voice my protest against such a policy for myself, for my party, for my State, and my Nation.

I am not ready to agree that compulsory military training is either a necessary or a harmless thing, which does not mean militarism. I am as confident as I live that it is not only a forerunner of militarism but is militarism in fact. I am as confident as that day follows night that to allow this policy to become a settled policy of the United States is to convert the schoolhouse into an arsenal, is but to abandon the belief that the citizen and not the soldier should rule the State.

It was 50 years of German militarism and Prussian autocracy that emboldened Germany to try to first crush the world and then rule it.

It was German militarism that caused the German Kaiser to lead 1,600,000 of his followers into open graves on foreign soil for an unjust cause.

It was German militarism that caused France to lose 1,385,000 lives, and the blood of her sons to color the waters of every stream that washes her sunny slopes.

It was 50 years of German militarism that caused poor little Belgium, scarcely as large as a postage stamp, to sacrifice 102,000 of her sons to stem the tide of the German hordes as they crashed down through Belgium to invade France.

It was 50 years of German militarism that caused 26 nations of the earth to engage in the world's most terrible war.

It was 50 years of militarism that cost the lives of the 7,500,000 men who died on the field of battle, more lives than had been lost in all the wars of history.

It was militarism that planted 50,000 American boys under the lilies and poppies of France, who died that free government might live and that Prussianism might not abide; that caused 236,000 of America's bravest sons to be wounded, maimed, and disabled.

It was militarism that had been the boast of Germany for 50 years that caused 26 nations of the earth to expend $187,000,000,000—more than one-third of the wealth of the earth.

It was militarism that caused 20,000 girls to become nurses to bind up the Nation's wounds.

It was militarism that caused the taxpayers of the United States to pay $30,000,000,000 in taxes.

It was militarism that caused the mothers of the land—4,800,000 of them—throughout the long, still hours of the night, to sit by the windows knitting sweaters and socks, watching and waiting and praying that their boys might return.

It was militarism that caused the induction of 4,800,000 men into the American Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

Yea, it was militarism that caused the German Kaiser to become an outcast, an exile, and who to-day sits behind brazen bars writing with feverish hand his own defense, sitting with cotton in his ears to drown the murmurings of an outraged nation for the havoc he has wrought.

I ask the Congress of the United States to ponder these facts and the fatal consequences that follow them before it commits this Nation to a system of militarism. Let those who insist upon militarism visit the Nation's hospitals and witness the wounded and maimed with arms, legs, and health gone. Let them witness our national cemeteries, where our American dead lie in abundance. May we not all together hope that the Congress and the American people may well ponder and well consider before they visit such a policy upon the Nation in times of peace?

I call to my aid in this protest the mothers of the land who gave these boys and ask them to voice their protest against this unnecessary thing. I call to my aid the memory of those who are gone that this may not be done. I call to my aid every American who loves her institutions and who is opposed to militarism and who believes more in construction than in destruction to enter his protest against the adoption of such a policy as a permanent, fixed American policy. It must not be. It shall not be. The people do not want it. It is un-American. It is the duty of the Congress to kill it and stop further agitation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back five minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, some time during the year, due to letters that some of us received and observations that had been made by various educational associations, I became interested in the general school situation throughout the country as it has been affected by a loss of teachers, very largely drained by the demands of the war. I instituted at the beginning of last month a survey, writing to every State superintendent in the United States, also to a great number of principals of normal schools, also to quite a number of the superintendents of secondary schools.

I asked them three questions as leading questions: First, to give the number of vacancies that they were unable to fill because they could not find the teachers; second, the number of teachers that were employed this year that fell below the standard of efficiency heretofore established in their State; third, the general tone of the schoolroom, determined largely by the uprooting of everything by the war; and last, what remedies they would suggest, if there were any to be suggested. I have received answers from every State superintendent in the United States.

Before I enter upon this discussion, however, I feel that it is due the gentleman who delivered such a magnificent address on the philosophic phase of modern economic life that I should say a word of commendation of his effort. He did it with so much sound sense and with such tremendous force that I am sorry not only that every Member of this Congress did not hear it but that it could not reach every nook and corner of this broad land. I think that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] not only rose to the height of a splendid statesman this afternoon but that he has sounded a much-needed warning against cheap nostrums as remedies of problems that can not be solved in any other way than upon a common-sense basis. [Applause.] It is really a tonic now and then to have the opportunity of hearing an address of that order. [Applause.]

Now to the subject: I can not comment upon all the letters that I have received, but to give you a general viewpoint let me read a few typical letters from different sections of the country; for example, the letter from Connecticut will be a very typical letter for New England. The State superintendent of that State writes:

No schools in Connecticut are without teachers except as occasional vacancies occur.

We have no accurate figures, but the evidence indicates a very few schools taught by teachers below the fair standard of efficiency. For example, 72 per cent of the teachers are either normal or college graduates.

That is a very high standard of teachers and reflects great credit upon that State because of the high rank it gives to the work of education.

3. The most disturbing part of the outlook for the future is the enrollment in the normal schools. They have shrunk 50 per cent in about two years.

That is a very significant statement, because the source of supply of the teachers of the country is the normal school, and if the attendance in a State like Connecticut is reduced 50 per cent it indicates that the supply of teachers in the future will be less than it is to-day and must result in great danger.

The enrollment this year is slightly larger than last, and we feel that we have passed the worst.

The rapid and general salary increase, together with a very willing public mind, indicate better conditions to come.

Most of the things needed are coming, and we believe the others will.

I think that is about the best letter I have received from New England and much better than those from some other sections of the country. All of them from that section are of that type, however.

I have here the letter from Vermont, and I would like to have those who listened to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] on the tax rate note this. The letter from Vermont says:

Our town meetings were held last Tuesday. At this time the people voted their taxes for the coming year. In many towns from which I have received reports the tax is 4 per cent of the assessed valuation and the assessed valuation in such towns is in excess of 80 per cent of the real value.

That is a splendid indication of the high estimate placed upon education by the State of Vermont and speaks well for her future. The letter is most interesting aside from the answers to my questions.

The State of Massachusetts has appointed a commission through the governor to make a survey of the school situation. I need not read further from this section of the country. The outlook in New England is not serious.

Now, passing from the New England section of the country to New York, what is said of that State could be said of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and States along that line. Instead of reading from the New York report I will read from the report from Illinois, which is on the same line:

The number of schools without teachers in Illinois is not greater than during the years preceding the war. There has been a great deal of change in the teaching force during the school year—teachers resigning to take positions that paid better salaries or for some other reason. Their places, however, have always been filled so far as my information goes.

That is very good on the status of the present situation.

2. On the question of how many teachers of low grade of preparation are teaching, I submit a statement prepared for me by the secretary of the State examining board.

In that statement he says that the efficiency is keeping fairly up to the standard, although there are quite a number of schools that are being taught by teachers below the standard. He adds, "The outlook for the future is one of the most disquieting elements in the situation." I have the report, which is too long to read. He makes specific recommendations of what must be done by local, State, and National authorities.

The report from Indiana is along this line:

1. Number of schools in Indiana without teachers. This is somewhat difficult to answer because of the combined and the consolidating and the general shifting in school circles. I should judge, however, that we could use 500 teachers more without overdoing the matter.

As to the number of teachers below the standard of efficiency he says:

We probably have 300 teachers who have had or are having extreme difficulty in qualifying for teaching positions.

That would indicate that Indiana is calling upon quite a number who are not up to the average requirements of efficiency as heretofore required by the State.

In Ohio, the State with which I am more familiar than any other, we have greatly suffered, largely by a tax limitation. There is a marked lack of the high grade of efficiency heretofore established. The superintendent reports 1,300 to 1,400 temporary and emergency teachers, and the number of inefficient teachers is beyond that figure. In our State we felt the loss of the best teachers due to the low salaries, as well as the severe drain by the war, and most of the States, according to reports, have suffered in that way. A general and State-wide appeal was decided upon by which the governor of the State asked the entire educational system of Ohio recently to observe a teacher-recruiting week. They set apart the week as a teachers' week. Every pulpit was asked to cover the situation in the State with reference to education. The newspapers were asked to write editorials upon the same. Public addresses were delivered. Clubs and various organizations were enlisted in the effort to produce a proper sentiment. Quite a number of men were asked to submit statements of larger rewards than simply the financial reward. I wrote a statement myself indicating why people will go into school work for a lower salary than they will go into some other kind of work:

"It can never be known what portion of the world's work is done without compensation save that of the joy in doing it. Much of the uplift of the race has been thus carried on. All of the missionary work is on this basis. Frequently it is said the greater the sacrifice the more important the service.

"This gratuitous service was not because the same talent could not command compensation, but because of love of the work, which was more inviting than the compensation.

"Education has in days past been looked upon as an end in itself rather than a means to an end. A human soul was to be developed and disciplined because it was a human soul. Teaching quite naturally was looked upon not only as a joy in the consciousness of moral and intellectual growth, but as a duty rendered to both the individual and the State. The position of honor here was not unlike the honor in other countries to serve in legislative halls without compensation.

"This altruistic attribute in the teacher's life is the one supreme test of success. No teacher will ever be remembered from the size of salary commanded. On the other hand, it will be the power of molding the child both mentally and morally. The history of the Nation is but a comment upon this fact.

"This age must show a greater appreciation of the teacher's work by a better compensation, but the true teacher will never attempt to substitute a money value for the spiritual and social value of her work.

"The teacher's slogan has ever been, and should ever remain: The measure of life is not what one gets out of it—rather what one puts into it."

Mr. Chairman, there is one thing that we ought to observe, and that is we have to impress upon the teaching force that their work is rather a "cause to be served than a task to be done." That does not sound very attractive in these material days, but, after all, that is one of the determinants for the school work. We are now absorbed in making a living rather than making a life. The former is necessary, but not all comprehensive.

The State of Pennsylvania makes a very handsome report. I recall what our colleague [Mr. FOCHT] mentioned a while ago. The present records show, out of approximately 20,000 teaching positions reported on outside of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, only 68 schools not filled. That is a wonderful record. This great Keystone State has more public spirit in her schools than any other State of which I know. Her annual county institutes are great public and educational mass meetings, and they draw the largest crowds of any meeting of the year, of whatever character. This State has for nearly 40 years felt the worth of the late Henry Houck, the Abraham Lincoln of the schoolmaster, and more recently the late Dr. Schaeffer, the educational philosopher.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman will recall the disappointment with regard to normal schools, that instead of supplying anything like 100 per cent, up until recently, anyhow during my term in the legislature, only 9 or 10 per cent were supplied from the normal schools, although the State supports them generously.

Mr. FESS. I do not know the percentage of teachers supplied by the more than dozen normal schools of the State. The report speaks of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, stating that those cities have suffered some:

The number of classrooms manned by teachers with no professional training has, however, materially increased and is of course very much larger than it should be.

I can only read fugitive statements in the limited time I have. New Jersey reports no schools without teachers and only 300 teachers below the standard. The outlook is better than in many other States because the local boards are substantially raising salaries, which have increased 27 per cent.

The New York report says:

Notwithstanding the lowering of standards, there are many positions in cities that are not filled. It may be stated that the number of schools in the villages and rural communities that are closed is relatively small, as every effort has been made to find teachers for these positions, even though they did not meet the requirements as to professional training.

That would suggest a lowering of the efficiency, which is the general testimony.

The report from the State of New York is a very good one and shows that they are not slow in meeting the requirements by additional taxation.

The State of Michigan makes a splendid report also. There are less than 100 teachers below the prewar standard. Michigan salaries are expected to attract teachers from other States.

In the Middle West—for example, Kansas; we have a very fine report from that State. It says:

We likely have a number of teachers not up to the standard which we would like to have, but we have not in any way lowered our standard of efficiency for teachers. We hope to have all the teachers needed for the next school year. A number of our teachers, both men and women, who entered war work in some of the many forms—overseas, in home camps, or office work in Washington, D. C.—are now, many of them, returning to Kansas and are seeking for teaching places for next year. Therefore we do not fear a serious shortage for the coming school year.

That is a word of splendid promise.

In nearly all of the States we have reports that teachers who left for the service, which, of course, are among the very best, are slow to return. It is a suggestion that other lines of activities are more attractive than that for which the teacher had fitted himself. This is serious, if true, and I have no doubt about the truth of the statements so widely reported.

Mr. SNYDER. I should just like to say, in addition to the information given by the New York report, that it is obligatory on the municipalities in that State to accept the school budgets provided by the school commissioners and trustees of the various towns and cities in the State, so that there is no reason why teachers should not be had, if they are available.

Mr. FESS. I should say to my friend, having been interested in school work for a good many years, that I understand the State of New York has a very fine system of education, and as a rule has no lack of funds to carry it into efficacious service.

Mr. SNYDER. And we have compulsory attendance.

Mr. FESS. Most of the States in the Union now have compulsory attendance. We have similar reports from other States. From Nebraska, and a very good one from Iowa, which, by the way, has the lowest percentage of illiteracy of any State in the Union. From all the Northwest we have very good reports. In the report from Wisconsin, however, as in the case of all the States, it is said that the teachers must be paid more money. That remedy is stated generally in all the letters, although I have not read that portion for fear that Members would think we were putting this thing on a venal and mercenary plane. Members of Congress are apt to jump at the conclusion that we have written a lot of letters pressing Congress for more money. There was no thought of that in mind and no mention of that in any of my letters, but it is universally demanded in all the letters in reply. This is true, that if private industry will call the best we have at two or three times the salary, nobody can find fault with the teachers for leaving the schools.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I agree with the gentleman that teachers should have a better salary and that we are losing our best teachers, but we can not relieve the situation; that will have to be done by the legislation of the States.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman from Texas has stated the matter exactly right. Most of the letters do not ask Congress to attempt any alleviation. It is fully realized that education is primarily a State matter.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Willingly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not true that from the beginning of business in this country school-teaching has been used as simply a stepping stone to what is called the learned professions?

Mr. FESS. It has been in a large sense, but it ought not to be.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You will never put a stop to it until teachers are paid enough to induce the boy or the girl to go into teaching as a lifetime business.

Mr. FESS. I agree with the gentleman from Missouri. I, however, do not share the general criticism, and I do not think the ex-Speaker does, that a person who is going into some other profession ought not for a period to teach. I believe teaching really is a splendid training for almost anything one would do later on. More than that, the teacher who is going to do something else must have vigor enough to make a good teacher.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I agree with the gentleman about that, but we pay now more to policemen to crack people's heads than we do to teachers to form the minds of the children. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. That is true, and if I had more time I would like to comment on that remarkable statement of the gentleman from Missouri, because it is actually true.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman from Mississippi stated a little while ago that the minimum salary, including the bonus, of teachers in the District was $1,440.

Mr. FESS. It will be when the present proposal becomes effective.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is the gentleman who has investigated this matter able to give an opinion as to what is the average salary paid teachers in the various States?

Mr. FESS. I can startle the gentleman by saying that in 1916 the average salary was $630. It is a little beyond that figure now, but not much.

Mr. HASTINGS. What was the minimum salary?

Mr. FESS. I do not know, but it went below $300. Five years ago the minimum salary was $500 in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it will not disturb the gentleman, I would like to ask him one other question.

Mr. FESS. It will not disturb me at all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman does not wish to answer, he need not. What do they keep up such a furor in this town about the school business for? [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. I can not answer the gentleman. The present proposal is a fine recognition of the teachers' work, and should serve as a stimulus for all the Nation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I remodeled it once, but now they are tearing the remodeling to pieces.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Is there not a well-defined encouragement all over the country to increase the pay of the school-teachers?

Mr. FESS. That is true. It has become a nation-wide movement, and in one direction.

Mr. MILLER. And that is one of the most wholesome things in the future.

Mr. FESS. Everywhere there is a tendency to increase the salaries, and they realize that the increase must come from the States and not from Congress.

Now, I will have time only to reflect the general statement from the various parts of the country and therefore I must pass over most of them. The Rocky Mountain States make a very good report, and matters are growing better, although they have suffered, and all state that salaries must be increased beyond what they now are.

The same is true of the States on the coast. I think the most appealing letters of all come from the South. Here is a letter from the State superintendent of the district of the gentleman who so edified us a moment ago with his address, the State of Mississippi:

We are short this year 500 white teachers in Mississippi and have in our schools a thousand others who ought not to be there. We have had to take these or let the children go without instruction. The outlook for the future is worse. Many of our best teachers are making arrangements to quit the work; we have succeeded in starving them out. More money is the fundamental need.

That is the shortest and the curtest letter, right to the point, that I have received.

Missouri makes a very good report. Future outlook depends upon attitude of local boards.

In New Mexico 5 per cent of schools are without teachers and 33⅓ per cent taught by teachers below former standard.

In Louisiana 100 white and 200 colored schools vacant, and from 500 to 800 below the former standard.

Virginia reports 500 schools without teachers.

Texas is in the midst of a popular campaign to correct the situation there.

Florida has 250 vacancies and 300 below standard.

Georgia reports 100 vacancies and 700 below the former standard.

A letter from Oklahoma says:

The number of teachers of a grade below efficiency is 30 per county, making 2,310 in all. The outlook next year is no better, except that the salaries in some instances will be increased, but the constitutional limits for raising the school fund have reached a majority of the districts.

We suffer from the same thing in Ohio, having a fixed maximum above which we can not go save by special vote of the locality.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The experience in South Carolina is the other way. In our constitution we place a minimum of 3 mills on all property for schools, and that has not stopped there. They have gone up until it runs anywhere from 6 to 10. The maximum is sometimes a little embarrassing to the taxpayer.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I have a very fine letter from the State superintendent of South Carolina. I shall not read any more of the letters; they are all of the same tenor, except there is not the yearning plea for better assistance for the teachers in any of the States which goes beyond that made by Mississippi, but all of them indicate that the school need is very great.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman, before he leaves this portion of his address, say whether he has anything in regard to private schools, colleges, and so forth?

Mr. FESS. No; I have not. I did not enter into the study of any save those supported by public taxation.

Mr. TILSON. Is it not the gentleman's experience or observation that very much the same condition prevails in the great colleges and larger schools and that by endowment and other ways they are compelled to raise money to increase the salaries of their professors and instructors?

Mr. FESS. Oh, yes; that is true. All such have substantially increased salaries.

Mr. TILSON. And they are doing it?

Mr. FESS. The colleges get their money very largely through private contributions, outside of the State universities. Money is pretty plentiful and the colleges, as a rule, are not suffering for want of money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman from Minnesota any more time to yield me?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. How much more time would the gentleman like?

Mr. FESS. I should like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes, with great pleasure.

Mr. FESS. I thank the gentleman. I want now to make some general statements of the situation, based upon the facts thus far submitted, and I would be very glad to have not only the attention but the sympathetic attention of the members of the committee, as I know every member will agree with what I am about to say as the result of this survey. I believe that the very genius of American success, which has won the admiration of the world, depends upon a higher grade of the general intelligence of all of our people. I am convinced that the public-school system is the very foundation of the hope and the aspirations of the Nation, and I have noted that under the stress of war, when we were calling the very highest talent in America from all sources of ability into war work, we were losing through that process the finest ability, the most progressive influence in the school work. They have gone out to help in the war. They have been paid war pay, which was very much beyond what they were receiving in the school work. They got a taste of a different kind of work, and I think it has had the influence of causing these people to say, "I have served a good part of my time in altruistic work in the schoolhouse, and now I am going to do something for myself and seek a different line of work." I find that many people went out of the schools, the very best we had, who will never come back into the profession. Next, we find that the level of cost has been so elevated under the stress of war that the cost of living has gone beyond the ability of the salaried man and the woman in the schools to maintain the standard required of them. Their expenses are made for them and not by them. A school man or woman must have a certain standard of outlay. They must regard certain amenities. They can not become slovenly. They must have a certain neatness in order to exert a proper influence. Their expenses, therefore, are not matters they can easily control. Yet, with the high-cost level, with salaries not going up and the purchasing power of the dollar going down, it has had exactly the same effect as if the board of education had cut their salaries in two. Then the increase of pay in other lines has beckoned these people to leave the school work. What is the result? One hundred thousand schools in America are without efficient teachers, according to the report made by the National Education Association only last month in the city of Cleveland. Besides that, trying to fill the schools, you must take what you can get, and rather than close the schools you will take less ability, and character less powerful, training less efficient, for the direction of the next generation, and, my good people, we are putting the very source of the greatness of this country into the hands of less efficient training than heretofore. It must be remembered that the childhood of America is the source of what America is to be, and we can not afford to neglect it. We must select the best talent in America to preside over the childhood while it is in the plastic condition where character is being formed. This can not be measured simply by how long a teacher went to college or what degree is worn, but everyone knows that the character of our children is made more often by the shadow that falls upon them from the teacher who presides than by any profession or grade of ability in rank that he might have. The way must be opened that the schools will invite the best we can produce. We must meet this difficulty in some way.

Here is another thing that we are suffering from that we never dreamed of. We started a campaign throughout this country to get better salaries for teachers. We called attention to the fact that the school work was not being appreciated, and that caused young people in schools ready to enter the normal schools and the colleges to look adversely upon the profession, because we published abroad the fact that salaries were not enough, and the very effort on the part of the country in a campaign to appreciate schools is one of the deterrents against entering the profession of teaching. There is another thing from which we are suffering. This war, uprooting everything, has lowered in a sense the general tone of the children in the schools, which is noted in the lack of esprit de corps, for no one can measure the influence of a wholesome teacher over the children. If the teacher is uneasy or dissatisfied, so will the school be unsettled. Another serious result is the lowering of the general regard for the teacher. The time was, and we are all aware of that fact, when the teacher in the community was the center of influence, and in many communities he was looked upon as the first citizen in the community. How is it to-day? The teacher to-day is looked upon too often, I am compelled to say, as an object of charity, to be apologized for. Why, it is said, "He is only a teacher."

Mr. Chairman, the public attitude toward this servant of the State, in charge of the very most important work in the State, must be corrected. It can not be if we treat the schools, the teachers, and the service as such that anyone can do the work and no great amount of salary is necessary.

There is no just reason for it, and we must right it. I hate to put anything like the teaching profession upon a salary basis, because a good teacher, aside from having what is necessary to live in comfort, is not going to spend his time thinking of his salary; but, my friends, you are compelled to make it high enough so that he knows that to-morrow he is not going to be turned out a beggar. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from New York.

Mr. SNYDER. Of course, I quite agree with what the gentleman says. A moment ago the gentleman said that a certain statement from the education department of the country stated that there were 100,000 schools without teachers?

Mr. FESS. Yes. That statement was recently made to the convention of teachers last month.

Mr. SNYDER. That did not mean there were 100,000 schools closed because of no teachers?

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. SNYDER. But 100,000 schools were short of some teachers.

Mr. FESS. Dean Chambers, of the University of Pittsburgh, presented me the following statement last December:

A recent bulletin of the National Education Association states that of the 600,000 public-school teachers in the country this year, 300,000, or 50 per cent, have had no education beyond the eighth grade, and the same number have had no professional training whatever; 100,000 more have had less than two years' training beyond the elementary grades. One-half of all the boys and girls in the public schools of the country—10,000,000—are under teachers who have had no special preparation for teaching; 7,000,000 are taught by novices who are scarcely more than children themselves; 1,000,000 have teachers who have not gone beyond the eighth grade themselves.

Thousands of the schools of the country are unable to secure any teachers whatever or have teachers without adequate training, accepted to meet the emergency. The National Education Association Bulletin estimates, on the basis of reports received from superintendents, that there are 38,000 schools closed this year on account of inability to find teachers, and that 65,000 other schools have been compelled to accept unsatisfactory teachers; that is, nearly 16 per cent of the teaching positions in our public schools are either vacant or unsatisfactorily filled.

The annual loss from the profession in the city of Pittsburgh is rapidly increasing. The number of new teachers necessary to replace the net loss from resignations and leaves of absence for each of the past four years was, respectively, 1916, 111; 1917, 161; 1918, 241; and 1919, 308. Or in terms of the total number of teachers in the city, these numbers represent annual net losses of 3.4 per cent, 5 per cent, 7.3 per cent, and 9.3 per cent. One teacher in every eleven, in the city of Pittsburgh was new in the system; three years ago only one in thirty was new.

How long can the city continue to replace its losses without depleting other communities of their remaining good teachers? The high-school principals, with but two exceptions, report that from one-fifth to one-third as many of their graduates as formerly are expressing their intention to teach, and in most cases these recruits are inferior to those formerly entering teaching and to those now going into other professions.

Not a single young man is reported as intending to teach in all the graduating classes of the city high schools last year.

This statement on the higher institutions is most significant. Some one here called attention to it, stating that the normal schools are decreasing while colleges and universities are very largely increasing. If you take the figures of this year, in your State universities for example, you will notice a very remarkable increase in attendance. This is due partly to the retarding of the war, which took the college boy, who upon his return entered the college or university, but not the normal school.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. FESS. That means that there is no letting down on advance training, but it means that the higher institutions of learning that are training other than teachers are increasing while those that are training teachers are decreasing. Now, can that mean anything? If the childhood of the Nation means anything for the next generation, we must not allow our schools to be depleted of the best men. That is why every letter speaks of the future. Some of them say it is dark, others say not bright, others say it is looking better. Let us all exalt the work of the teacher. It can not be overestimated. It was Sir Humphrey Davey, the great scientist, who saw a young fellow step into his laboratory one evening, and he hung around, and then the next evening he came again, and the next evening, and finally the great scientist asked why he was there, when he replied he was interested in some experiments. Sir Humphrey asked him to come in and become a regular attendant. That youngster in time became Sir Michael Farraday. Later, when Sir Humphrey was asked what was his greatest invention, what was his greatest discovery—and the shelves are full of the books of this scientist—he said, "My greatest discovery was Michael Farraday." [Applause.] As the ancient Greek once said, there is nothing great on earth but man, and nothing great in man but mind; so must we say our most important business in a Republic is to produce the mental and moral maximum of our people. The difference between one and another is not the weight of the body nor anything physical, but it is the use to which the mind is placed, especially if that mind has been trained. [Applause.] Now, my friends, I appeal to the lawmakers of the Nation here in Congress assembled, our Nation can not reach its maximum if we turn this pyramid upside down.

What do I mean? I mean that only a day or so ago we had a report, an official report, suggesting that the bricklayers are asking $1.25 an hour, $10 for an eight-hour day, $60 a week if we count six days to the week, $240 a month, and $2,880 a year. That is for a bricklayer. I am not saying he shall not get it, although it does appear to me that there must be a limit somewhere or else building will be retarded. But I want the teacher, who does the finest work for civilization that will be done, to have some sort of recognition as well as the person who does not need to train himself at great length to do his work. The bricklayer who is doing a fine piece of work must put brain back of it, and if the brain is back of it the training will be due to the teacher he had when he was young. No man or woman with an undeveloped brain will ever become a skilled worker. It is not only the ability that we need and will employ, but it is also the kind of moral influence which he will exert in his community as a bricklayer that you and I will be willing to pay for. I want brawn to have its recognition. I want also brain to have its recognition, and if the public exalts a hod carrier, who does not need an hour's training, in remuneration for his work above that of his teacher, where is the teacher who is not wholly actuated by altruism, who has spent four years in high school to get ready and four years in college to meet the requirements, who is going to take less than what the hod carrier can get? Gentlemen, we have got to meet this. [Applause.]

Look at the figures I here submit for New York. The figures given in the list are those midway between the highest and the lowest salaries received in that line of business, one-half the persons reporting receiving more than the salary named, one-half receiving less than the salary named:

1. Machinist	$1,945
2. Inside wireman	1,859
3. Lather	1,825
4. Plumber	1,716
5. Bricklayer	1,716
6. Blacksmith	1,697
7. Glazier	1,659
8. Machine tender (printing)	1,612
9. Structural-iron worker	1,602
10. Head baker	1,300
11. Carpenter	1,144
12. Hod carrier	1,144
13. High-school teacher	1,107
14. Intermediate-school teacher	889
15. Elementary-school teacher	807

On the basis of the figures given salaries of nearly 8,000 teachers in New York City are less than the wages paid to any of the foregoing occupations in the city of Chicago. It is worth, per year, $394 more to carry bricks than to train children, $363 more to mold dough for bread than to mold boys and girls into citizenship of the world's greatest Republic.

Mr. Chairman, in summing up I make the following recapitulation of my survey and ask your candid consideration of the same:

1. A lack of teachers to supply the needs of teaching.
2. Pronounced lowering of the standards of efficiency to supply the vacancies caused by resignations.
3. Alarming falling off of attendance in normal schools, which are our chief supply for teachers.
4. Striking lowering of the school tone.

From the various reports we note that the war demands drained the profession of its most able, progressive, and ambitious teachers. Since the war many of these have chosen not to return.

The country's effort to secure more teachers in a wide campaign has emphasized the fact of loss to the profession and has further discouraged entry into the profession of less desire than others. This is shown by a falling off in attendance in the normal schools of the United States 25 per cent and in the membership of graduating classes 34 per cent. This is further emphasized by an increase of college and university attendance looking to entrance of professions other than teaching.

A mental examination to test the entrants in normal schools the present year shows a distinctive inferior grade as compared with former years. This test was made in Pennsylvania.

The profession is fast becoming feminine. For years the number of male teachers has been steadily decreasing. The war has almost completed the male elimination. Men of virility and ability are shunning the profession.

The emphasis of the past generation upon the material side of life has largely materialized, if not venalized, the profession to the extent that the profession has suffered both from a lowering of the standard of patriotic service in its personnel and also from a degrading of the profession in the public mind.

The former great regard for the school-teacher in the community, who made not only the chiefest character builder, as the prophet of a better day, but the leading if not the first citizen of the community, has given way to a mere apology as only a mere teacher, to be looked upon as little less than charity if not an object of pity and apology. This is shown in the small appreciation of the teacher's work in placing the salary below that of a hod carrier.

A comparison of wages will show an alarming failure to appreciate the mission of the teacher. The failure to meet the demands for high-grade talent to educate the youth in proper ideals can but produce bad results. How can ideals of a genuine Americanism be expected when the youth is presided over by anything less than the very best type of manhood or womanhood? The source of the world's greatest suffering is ignorance. The trail of humanity's tragedies is identified with ignorant superstition led by the agitator whose chief field of operation is the uneducated mass. The real cure of these evils is a proper education. This can not be done by theorists who know nothing of practical matters. The difficulty in the past is the ignorance of practical affairs of the average professor, who is apt to become the butt end of ridicule in his community.

Proper education will cure nine-tenths of all the isms from which the world is now being threatened. Lack of education does not only retard progress but feeds upon the anarchistic conditions prevalent in Russia and rapidly spreading throughout the world.

A proper understanding of fundamental principles, grounded in our youth at the proper age, is demanded for the perpetuity of our institutions under which the people may continue to live in peace and harmony. Democratic government must depend upon an intelligent electorate determined in the public schools of the country, and so well established that it can not be misled by dangerous leadership too often found among us and the result of an improper education in our higher institutions of learning. The country must set about in an intense system of education to embrace every agency of training, especially in our school system, to insure against un-American doctrines. These problems of Government can not be cured by law but by education. It is not a matter of restraint but of attitude of mind. Both great political parties must take a decisive stand to place education upon that basis which will enable it to become the chief agency for the security of the perpetuity of our Nation and the things for which it stands. The one supreme demand is to exalt the profession and make it inviting to the strongest talent of the country. This demand must lift the profession above the rank of charity. We must keep the pyramid of American ambition right side up. Brawn is important, but brain is more important. The exaltation of brawn above brain is inverting the pyramid.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER]. [Applause.]

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. The gentleman has a very important subject to discuss in which a great many are interested.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently there is no quorum present, and the Clerk will call the roll.

R. 13266, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, when 282 Members, a quorum, had answered to their names, and that he presented therewith the names of the absentees for insertion in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, within the time allowed me by the courtesy of my colleagues I shall endeavor to give a few of the elements of the Meuse-Argonne campaign, the greatest campaign in which American troops were ever engaged, and which opened 18 months ago to-day at the hour of 2.30 o'clock a. m., Paris time.

To break through the Hindenburg line and those supporting it, to smash and grind its way through the strongest fortified positions on the western front, and to cut a railway line 54 kilometers to the north of the stabilized enemy line was the task appointed and accepted by the American Army. It was done in 47 days of constant battle, and the story of how it was done and who did it is the story of the Meuse-Argonne campaign.

It was from every point of view overwhelmingly the greatest in magnitude, the most daring, and the most effective in immediate results of any campaign in which American troops were ever engaged. The successful finish brought the great World War to a close at once.

SITUATION AND CONCEPTION.

The operation which the Allies were then engaged in was in its nature a gigantic converging or "closing-in" campaign.

The western front in July, 1918, was in outline a huge irregular three-quarter circle, bellying to the west, it having spread and expanded as one successful drive of the enemy followed another. This three-quarter irregular circle commenced at the southeast point of the frontier of Holland and then followed that frontier to the North Sea, thence the bulging crescent to the west, thence creeping back eastward to the north of Verdun. The open quarter extended from this latter point northeast to the nearest point on the Holland boundary. In this connection the master strategy was to close the open section—to close the neck of the bottle.

OBJECTIVE OF AMERICAN FORCES.

Through this open one-quarter circle and running out through the German lines from Lille in northern France, through Mezieres, Sedan, Longwy, Carignan, to Metz and the extreme south of the front was the greatest strategic system of railway perhaps ever known in history and certainly the most effective upon which a war was ever based. This railroad was a four-track system from Lille to Longwy and double track from the last-named city south to the important industrial cities in Alsace.

Branch lines and feeders to and from the east were hooked up in a most ingenious and effective manner, making of the whole a network or system by which not only supplies of all kinds could be delivered at the most advantageous points but great volumes of troops could be brought in, evacuated, or swiftly shifted from one point to another. This remarkable system of railroad was the almost life artery of the German Army.

It became evident that in a successful converging campaign it would be necessary for the enemy to evacuate large numbers of troops over this line in order to avoid the congestion incident to such a campaign.

About this time it became known to the Allied Chief Command that in the event the enemy could not hold its front in the face of a united converging offensive it was the plan of their high command to evacuate its lines in France as orderly as possible, shift its troops to the east over this railroad, and form a new line of defense farther east on German soil, from which the war could be carried on during the year 1919. That this was the intention of the Germans is borne out by Gen. Ludendorff's subsequent writings. The Allied Command had rightly prejudged the situation.

Thus it was that this system of railway which had been the great feeder of troops and supplies into France was now to become the great feeder out—the only means of escape.

To cut this railroad formed an immediate part, by far the most immediate important part, of the general united offensive. If the railroad line could be cut before any considerable number of troops were evacuated a complete and appalling disaster would befall the German armies. It would bring either surrender or destruction. It was up to the American forces to cut this railway, and to do it at the most sensitive and vital point—at Sedan or immediately east of it, Sedan preferably.

THE PLAN.

At a meeting of the allied commanders held late in July it was agreed that the first American operation should be the reduction of the St. Mihiel salient. A successful operation in this sector would clear up the transportation of troops and supplies from Paris to Nancy, hook up Verdun with the main transportation systems, strengthen everything from Verdun to the south, and from an offensive point of view throw the great fortress of Metz and its circle of forts directly open to attack. It would also open up an inviting campaign to be directed against the great mining district of Briey, out of which all Germany was being supplied with iron. By this latter campaign the same north and south railway system would be cut, but the cutting here would not be vital. It was further agreed that the St. Mihiel sector should be reduced as quickly as troops could be assembled. This was accomplished, and the salient completely reduced by the Americans on September 12 and 13.

In the meantime, during the month of August, great advances were made on the French and British fronts, the former coming in from the west and southwest, and the latter from the west and northwest. The enemy being driven in from all directions was falling back toward Sedan, the point of evacuation. It must be borne in mind that the St. Mihiel offensive was a part of the comprehensive united allied advance, a major operation preliminary to another major operation soon to follow.

Early in September, in view of this continued success of the Allies, it was definitely decided that immediately after the conclusion of the St. Mihiel operation the American forces, or all that could be spared, should be switched to the northwest of Verdun, and that the Americans should take over from the French the front from the west bank of the Meuse River westward to the western rim of the Argonne Forest, a distance of some 35 kilometers.

To crush in this front meant the taking of many of the strongest fortified enemy positions in France. It also meant the conquest of the Argonne Forest, an almost impenetrable thicket of trees and undergrowth, covering a broken, eroded, rocky tract of land varying from 3 to 6 miles in width and about 10 miles in length, cut and crisscrossed by every conceivable kind of ravine, gully, and gorge. This forest extended in its longest measurement fairly north and south west of the valley of the Aire River. Preparations for these two major operations were made simultaneously, and several reserve divisions were withdrawn from the St. Mihiel operations and shifted to this new sector as soon as the reduction of the St. Mihiel sector became an assured success. Some 15 divisions were to assemble on the new front, and the major operation just being concluded was to be followed by this other with an interval of only 14 days. This in itself was unthinkable to the Germans. The concentration was swift. Seven divisions were brought from St. Mihiel, 3 from the south, 3 from the west with the French, and 2 from training centers, making 15 in all. This concentration was effected under cover of darkness and with the greatest secrecy. Two hundred thousand men were to assemble, with all the supplies necessary for an unlimited offensive. The date of this new offensive was set for September 26.

On the night of the 25th the French were withdrawn on this front, leaving but a screen. No army ever had a higher morale than the American. They were fresh from witnessing their successful results at St. Mihiel, where some 16,000 prisoners had been taken in two days. Gen. Pershing, in his final report, states that he chose the difficult Meuse-Argonne sector because, as he says, "in my opinion no other allied troops had the morale or the offensive spirit to overcome successfully the difficulties to be met in the Meuse-Argonne sector." [Applause.] I must say again and emphasize the fact that this front, from the Meuse River to the western rim of the Argonne Forest, was the most strongly fortified and at the same time the most sensitive front throughout the entire war zone. The five defense lines, the Hindenburg, Hagan-Stellung, Volker-Stellung, Kreimhilde-Stellung, and the Freya-Stellung, covered barely 20 kilometers—a solid wall or fortified line in which every device was in use known to make defensive positions more impregnable. It was against this wall of concrete, steel, wire, and machine guns that the American Army was to advance.

THE ASSIGNMENTS OF DIVISIONS.

For strategic purposes and to facilitate field operations the American Army was divided into three Army corps, Gen. John J. Pershing, commander in chief Expeditionary Forces, in personal command.

The First Corps: Maj. Gen. Hunter Liggett, corps commander, with New York City's Seventy-seventh Division, Maj. Gen. Robert Alexander commanding; Pennsylvania's Twenty-eighth, Maj. Gen. Charles H. Muir commanding; and Missouri-Kansas's Thirty-fifth, Maj. Gen. Peter E. Traub commanding, held the left of the front. Strength, 68,838. The division assignments, west to east in order, were the Seventy-seventh, Twenty-eighth, and Thirty-fifth.

The Fifth Corps: Maj. Gen. George H. Cameron, corps commander, with the Pacific coast's Ninety-first, Maj. Gen. William H. Johnson commanding; Ohio's Thirty-seventh, Maj. Gen. C. S. Farnworth commanding; and Virginia-Maryland's Seventy-ninth, Maj. Gen. Joseph C. Kuhn commanding, held the center of the line. Strength, 53,338. The division assignments, west to east in order, were the Ninety-first, Thirty-seventh, and Seventy-ninth.

The Third Corps, Maj. Gen. Robert L. Bullard, corps commander, with the Fourth Division Regulars, Maj. Gen. John L. Hines, commanding; Pennsylvania-West Virginia, Virginia's Eightieth, Maj. Gen. A. Cronkhite, commanding, and Illinois's Thirty-third, Maj. Gen. George Bell, jr., commanding, held the right of the line. Strength, 71,153. The division assignments west to east in order were the Fourth, Eightieth, and Thirty-third.

In all, 193,329 combat troops were in the initial advance, about 9,200 per mile, on a basis of a 21-mile, or 35 kilometer, front. Each corps had one additional division held as a reserve. Three other divisions were in the first concentration. The Artillery consisted of 2,775 cannon of all caliber, ranging from the French 75 mm. to the 9-inch howitzer, and one naval battalion of 14-inch mounts. There were 189 small tanks and 821 airplanes. One hundred and forty-two of these tanks and 604 of the airplanes were manned by Americans. These combined with the necessary supply service, ammunition trains, air service, engineers and pioneer units, hospital and general equipment constituted the concentration.

In our Expeditionary Force the following order was observed in numbering the divisions: One to 25, inclusive, were formed from the Regular Army; 26 to 50, inclusive, from the National Guard of the various States; and 51 and above from the National Army. By reference to these numbers we can immediately place the character of the troop used in any operation.

THE ADVANCE.

Early during the night of the 25th the French were withdrawn and the Americans went into line throughout the sector. At 2.30 a. m. on the morning of the 26th the artillery began, and 2,775 guns opened fire. There was no longer necessity for secrecy. Earth, air, and sky broke in a blaze. The very foundations groaned and trembled. These old forests, rocks, and crest had seen wars before, many before the day of the Yankee boy, but never a war like this when cavern and earth and sky was one gigantic battle field. On an average a cannon to every 50 feet worked this bedlam of confused and commingled thunderbolts. Such an opening of the gigantic duel had not been equaled in this or any other war. The men at the guns, some bareheaded and stripped to the waist, were insensible of everything but the wild confusion, others more composed working like pieces of well-oiled and perfectly adjusted machinery, the officers watching the finders that the range remain correct or with eyes peering through night glasses picking up the stress of this mad scene. The scream of the big shells overhead preceded the deeper thunder of the greater guns. The very earth was beaten into foam by the 300,000 rounds and over fired in the three hours—an average of over 100,000 shots an hour, or nearly 2,000 per minute. During these wild hours the doughboys, with muscles and nerves tuned to the surroundings, were awaiting the hour when they should move out into this hell of destruction to "mop up" what was left.

At the hour of 5.30 in the time-table the fieldpieces dropped into a rolling barrage and the doughboys were up and off, not in the wild and resistless charge of olden days amid the shouting of officers and the blowing of bugles, but slowly and cautiously as the panther hunts in the jungle. The romance and poetry of war are gone! Chivalry had no place in the Meuse-Argonne! In the open east of the forest the men took the open-field formation in which they had been especially trained. In the forest it was from tree to tree, a strange place for New York City's National Army, the boys from Broadway and the avenues and the East Side. On the east rim of the forest, dipping down into the trough of the Aire to its water flow, came Pennsylvania's old National Guard—the Twenty-eighth. Huge buttresses shunting out from the forest into this trough afforded enemy cover for every conceivable kind of fire, especially that of machine guns. But the boys of the "Iron Division" never waver; such is the law of their land. [Applause.] On their right and on the eastern slope of the same trough and on the eastern rim of the valley was the Thirty-fifth—the old National Guard from the Ozarks and the plains of Kansas. [Applause.] Soldiers every one of them, the equal of the best! These, too, caught the fire from the same places and from machine-gun nests in the immediate front. Such were the positions of the First Corps on the left of the line.

On its right came the Fifth Corps with the Pacific coast's Ninety-first National Army, the boys from "out there," six footers and born fighters. [Applause.] This division held the left of the center. Next came Ohio's Thirty-seventh, old National Guard, the boys from the great old Buckeye State, who never go any direction but ahead. [Applause.] This unit formed the center. Next on the right came Virginia-Maryland's Seventy-ninth National Army, the boys from the Old Dominion and the Chesapeake, fine men, good soldiers, fighters every one of them. [Applause.] These constituted the Fifth Corps or center.

The plan of advance called for these three divisions to drive the "spearhead" or wedge into the enemy positions. This undertaking speaks for itself. They must advance ahead of the others and in doing so receive the pounding from the enemy guns, not only in their immediate front but the enfilading fire from the forest on the left and from the big guns on the heights of the Meuse on the far right. The units in the lead always receive a concentrated fire, for if the advances can be checked the whole line is stopped. According to the plan of the campaign, the French Fourth Army, operating in the sector immediately to the west of the forest, was to drive a similar wedge, though not so deep, to the west of the forest. Thus the two wedges, one to the west and the other to the east, would force the enemy in the forest to retreat approximately at the rate of the advancing wedges, else it would become isolated. The Twenty-eighth and Thirty-fifth formed what might be termed the western slant of the wedge. Behind these two wedges on either rim of the forest came the Seventy-seventh, driving through the center, hammering and beating its way, or in the language of the day "mopping up." This was the plan to conquer the Argonne, it being considered impregnable to a direct frontal attack.

On the right of the "wedge" divisions, and forming the right of the advancing front, came the Third Corps with the Fourth Division Regulars, who always "stay put," holding the right-flank position.

Next came the Pennsylvania-West Virginia Eightieth, National Army, the boys from the Blue Ridge, tall fellows, every one a dead shot; then the Thirty-third of Illinois, the cool, calculating, almost mathematical fighters, the National Guard of the old Prairie State. [Applause.] The two latter divisions on the west bank of the Meuse were to swing on nearly a quarter circle to the right in order to protect the right flank of the line. Such, in brief, were the plans matured for the advance as the calendar registered 2.30 o'clock on the morning of Thursday, September 26.

Odd it is to observe that in this battle line 3,000 miles from the home land and when America was starting in upon the greatest campaign in which her uniform was ever worn, Chicago and New York held the east and west of the line. [Applause.]

All went well. America's Army, untrained, undisciplined, and wild in German eyes, was to the test not only to work out and to write new pages of its own glorious history but to do so much in writing the history of the world in the awful autumn of the Christian year 1918. [Applause.]

The line started. The bulging front began to develop, steadily progress being made through the wrecked or partially wrecked defenses. The center of the thrust and the flank supporting divisions failed to keep liaison from the start owing to the unequal resistance and the difficult terrain. Two of these divisions were advancing over Dead Man's Hill and vicinity, where for nine months the French and German Armies rolled backward and forward with an almost tidelike regularity—an earthly waste of exploded mines and shell craters. The wonder is that they could go through it at all. The Boches were up and defending their lines even in this country, where the new cannonading simply worked over the old ruins. There was nothing new to destroy; it had all gone years before. The Twenty-eighth, Thirty-fifth, Ninety-first, Thirty-seventh, Seventy-ninth, and Fourth "busted in" the front. All made advances. The Twenty-eighth took the dominating hill 263 on the forest edge. The Eightieth and Thirty-third completed the swing to the right. The Thirty-third, dropping down from the bluff, crossed Forges Creek and the swampy bottom, captured 1,450 prisoners, seven 6-inch howitzers, and 22 fieldpieces, and then "dug in" on the banks of the Meuse, all before the Germans knew exactly what was happening. Salients were driven on either side of wooded knolls amid the raging fire of machine guns. These, one after another, were taken. Montfaucon, which dominated the entire country between the forest and the Meuse, and where the German Crown Prince had his headquarters during the awful assaults on Verdun in 1916, was taken by units of the Thirty-seventh and Seventy-ninth by noon of the second day. On the first day of the offensive the line was advanced at least 4 miles. By the end of the second day the enemy had thrown in six fresh divisions. The campaign was eating up men. The Americans fought on, and by the night of the 29th had effected a maximum penetration of 14 kilometers. Divisions in the bulging center were being raked by not only direct but cross fire. So desperate was the fighting, day and night, in darkness, rain, and fog, that the Thirty-seventh was relieved during the night of the 29th by Michigan-Wisconsin's Thirty-second, the old National Guard from the Wolverine and Badger States, who always fight like demons. Maj. Gen. W. G. Haan commanded this division. At the same time the Seventy-ninth was withdrawn and the Third Regulars, Gen. Beaumont Buck commanding, placed in the line. On the 30th the First Regulars, the "first in France," Maj. Gen. Charles P. Summerall commanding, relieved the Thirty-fifth. All the time the engineer and pioneer forces were working day and night. Roads were being laid out, constructed, and connected up for the Artillery, the supply service, ammunition trains, the hospital units, and the field service. Here is where the Motor Transport Corps "made good."

In this wild advance and amid obstacles which it seemed no human effort could overcome the flow of supplies was maintained and the Army thereby kept in motion. In despair the enemy brought new divisions from the Metz sector. They now thoroughly understood the American objective and they further understood for America to gain it meant the doom of the German armies. The net results of the advances up to October 1 were breaking through the Hindenburg line and the Hagan-Stellung, the first two lines of defense, and the capture of part of the third line, the Volker-Stellung. From the 1st to the 4th of the month the line was practically stationary, but heavy fighting was going on everywhere on the front, with the exception of the extreme right flank. The lull in the advance gave a much-needed opportunity for the engineer and pioneer troops to connect up the roadways. The soft soil rendered the advances of the Artillery one of the most difficult tasks of the campaign.

SECOND PHASE, OCTOBER 4 TO NOVEMBER 1.

On the night of the 3d the Ninety-first was withdrawn and the Thirty-second shifted to the new position. The Thirty-seventh and the Ninety-first were subsequently sent to Flanders to reinforce the Sixth French Army operating in that sector.

Early on the morning of the 4th the artillery opened fire on the second phase of the campaign by a heavy barrage. The doughboys were up and off again. Tremendous resistance was to meet the advance, as the enemy had brought in six more new divisions. The Badgers and Wolverines suffered tremendously on the 4th and 5th. They took the village of Gesnes, but had to give it up to avoid being isolated. On the 5th the Blue Ridgers took Ogons Woods by way of an evening surprise. On the morning of the 7th, amid a fog and rain, the Georgia-Alabama National Army, the Eighty-second, the "All American" brilliant and dashing boys, made an attack on the east line of the Argonne, supported by two brigades from the Twenty-eighth. Maj. Gen. George B. Duncan commanded this division. This move was made not only to take certain commanding positions held by the enemy but for the greater purpose of diverting attention from the activities soon to break out east of the Meuse, where several divisions released from the St. Mihiel had been concentrated to strengthen the Seventeenth French Corps.

All the time from September 26 the New York boys had been biting and gnawing away at the Argonne. It was on October 2 that Maj. Whittlesey, with the First Battalion of the Three hundred and eighth Infantry, together with parts of the Three hundred and sixth and Three hundred and seventh Machine Gun Companies, became cut off and surrounded. He and his command were rescued on the 7th by this terrific thrust of the Eighty-second, assisted by the First Regulars.

The Kriemhilde line had been broken farther to the east, but in the center it was still holding strong. In this situation it was determined to make an assault on Romagne, the key to the line in front of the center, by detouring around a system of hills which lay to the east of the village. The Rainbow Division, the Forty-second, famed as fighters from the beginning, Maj. Gen. Charles T. Menoher commanding, came up on the left of the Thirty-second, swung around, and came into action in an encircling movement in connection with the Thirty-second, but the Kriemhilde was not yet to be broken.

On the 8th instant, near Chatel Chihiry, occurred the famous exploit of Corpl. Alvin C. York, Company G, Three hundred and twenty-eighth Infantry. After three noncommissioned officers had been wounded, York assumed command, and, leading 7 men, charged an enemy machine-gun nest, capturing 132 prisoners, including 4 officers.

The terrific campaign was telling badly on the troops. Replacements must be had by the thousands. Two divisions of ours which were with the British were brought from that front and thrown in; also two from the French. There is a limit to the endurance of even the most willing troops, for flesh and blood has its bounds. The First Regulars began its famous blast of the "wedge" down the Aire Valley, which it did in the face of an awful fire, clearing the way for the Twenty-eighth advancing, with the Eighty-second following up, and "digging in" against the Kriemhilde line. The Thirty-second, together with the First and Eighty-second, kept up its hammering on Romagne. The "iron boys" from the Old Keystone State had been in this awful valley for two full weeks, but before retiring they crossed the river, and took Hill 244 as a parting salute. The "wedge" the First Division had now driven down the valley brought that division into danger; it had to be widened; and that job was given to certain units of the Thirty-second. This task was to widen it on the right as the Eighty-second had on the left. They broke in by getting a toe hold on the heights of Dame Marie on the left; were driven back in the center; but in the right got in with both feet good and strong. Then came days of awful gruelling, which test the fiber, nerve, and blood of soldiers. The left units of the Thirty-second pried the lid off Romagne and stormed through the town. Good positions at the base of Hill 288 were captured by the Forty-second. Right here the Thirty-second came swinging around in a sort of flanking movement, made the toe hold on Dame Marie sure by driving the enemy clear off the heights. Meanwhile the Forty-second was on its way getting up Hill 288; it took and then stormed on to Cote de Chatillion, which also fell. Thus Kriemhilde was broken, cut in its strongest point. This breaking of Kriemhilde was a splendid piece of teamwork, in which honors were divided between the Thirty-second, Eighty-second, Forty-second, and the Third Regulars, which latter took the stress off the Thirty-second. Similar mauling and "busting in" was going on with the Fourth Regulars in Freya-Stellung, supporting line of Kriemhilde. The American Army now was master of the situation. All five of the enemy's lines of steel, concrete, and wire were now down and out—down and out forever. The Eightieth came back into line and relieved the First Regulars, and in the wee small hours on the morning of the 10th instant certain units entered the village of Cunel and brought back two full battalion staffs as prisoners. The Eightieth had done good work in its four days, when it was relieved by the Fifth Regulars, the "Wild Fifth," Maj. Gen. John E. McMahon commanding.

It was now the 14th of the month, and the Argonne was cleared of the enemy, a feat which echoed and reechoed not only along the front from the Meuse to the North Sea but throughout the world. The Kriemhilde taken and the Argonne cleared rang even to the inner walls of Berlin. [Applause.]

Before this, however, affairs broke out east of the Meuse. The French Seventeenth Corps, increased by the Twenty-ninth Division, Maryland-Virginia National Guard, Maj. Gen. Charles G. Morton commanding, had been holding the great right flank of the battle line, now broke out by driving a smashing blow on the German pivot east of the Meuse. Units taking part were the Twenty-ninth American Division and the Eighteenth and Twenty-sixth French Colonials. The blow was struck across the German main front, and was a big success. Its suddenness, force, and desperation fairly took the breath of the enemy. This was on October 8, and by the evening of the 9th the enemy had been driven back 4 miles, allowing the Thirty-third to cross the Meuse at Connevoye. The building of the bridge at this point, 162 feet long and in 18 feet of water in a tremendous current, amid an appalling gunfire, will always remain one of the strongest achievements of the Engineers. A counterattack was beaten off by the Twenty-ninth and Thirty-third Divisions. On the 16th the Seventeenth French Colonials and certain units of the American Twenty-ninth were relieved by the New England boys, the famous Twenty-sixth, Maj. Gen. Clarence R. Edwards commanding, and from thence to the Seventy-ninth, the Twenty-ninth, Twenty-sixth, and Thirty-third Divisions, together with the Eighteenth and Twenty-sixth French Colonials, kept up a steady, irresistible advance east of the Meuse. It was too late for the enemy to get more of its reserves from Metz. Consternation reigned throughout the German Army.

By October 12 the American front covered approximately 75 miles, extending from the west rim of the Argonne Forest northeast around Verdun and to the south through the old St. Mihiel sector. A million men were under the personal command of Gen. Pershing. Good generalship called for a segregation of this force. Accordingly the Second Army was organized to take over the front east of the Moselle and on to the south, with Maj. Gen. Robert L. Bullard placed in command. Maj. Gen. George H. Cameron was also assigned to the new Second Army and Maj. Gen. Charles P. Summerall appointed to the command of the Fifth Corps, First Army. Maj. Gen. John L. Hines succeeded Bullard in command of the Third Corps, while Maj. Gen. Mark L. Hersey succeeded Hines as commander of the Fourth Division, and Brig. Gen. F. E. Bamford succeeded Summerall as commander of the First Division.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to speak for 15 minutes more, the time not to be taken out of the time allowed for general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that that can not be done in the committee, the time having been fixed by the House.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And I yield nine minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for 14 minutes.

Mr. MILLER. I thank the gentlemen.

Maj. Gen. Hunter Liggett was assigned to the command of the First Army and Maj. Gen. James A. Dickman was given command of the First Corps. Gen. Bullard was directed to begin preparing for the advance of the Second Army against Metz and the Briey. Affairs were moving with marvelous regularity and system. The French on the west-southwest and the British on the west-northwest were likewise making wonderful gains. The enemy everywhere was being driven in, riveted down, and smothered. The world thought it could scent the forced withdrawal of the German forces from France before the snow should cover the ground. [Applause.]

The hammering continued, the First and Fifth Divisions were relieved by the Forty-second and Eightieth, and an attack all along the entire front was made on the 14th instant, which completed the "busting," as before stated. An advance of 17 kilometers out of the precious 54 necessary to cut the railway at Sedan had been made since September 26. The American Army was in high spirits, though pressed to the utmost of its physical endurance. More willing troops never held a field of battle. Artillery once sent into line was not withdrawn until it was ready for the scrap pile. The supply service had done its part well and good; the Engineers the same; the ammunition came in amounts necessary; the Pioneers on the spot in a jump, while the Medical Corps, in an exertion which seemed almost superhuman, met every requirement in the tremendous duties of these awful days.

On October 24 Maj. Gen. Clarence R. Edwards was relieved of the command of the Twenty-sixth Division and was succeeded by Brig. Gen. Frank E. Bamford; by this transfer a vacancy was caused in the command of the First Division, and Brig. Gen. Frank E. Parker was appointed to fill the same.

By the end of October an advance of 21 kilometers or nearly 12 miles had been made, 18,600 prisoners, 370 cannon, and over 1,000 machine guns were trophies of war.

The strain upon the American Army was tremendous, but with the enemy it was consternation if not panic. The Boche had been unable to stop this very flood of khaki from sweeping through, over, and under her most formidable defenses. She could also see her indispensable railway line seriously menaced, for she could see herself "bottled up" in Sedan as she herself had "bottled up" the French in the selfsame historic city in 1870. [Applause.]

THE THIRD AND LAST PHASE—NOVEMBER 1–11.

At 3.30 o'clock on the morning of November 1 the beauty of a moonlit frosty night was dashed out by the bursting of another volcano of fire—the signal of a general advance. For two hours the flashes of guns of all calibers blinded the stars as they had been silently looking down on the vain, mad acts of men. The army was now entering upon its final lap—one which if made in time would break the military power of Germany and bring the World War to an end in 1918.

Little did you and I here in Congress, with all of our thoughts centered on the war, reading the daily—hourly—bulletins realize that the hands of the clock as they ticked and turned pointed unerringly to the fact that the end was near. We had planned strong and well and patiently for at least another long, anxious year. But "over there" the boys knew that victory was only 9 miles away, and as the sailor man says "Dead ahead and on." The doughboy answered the opening call and was up and off once more. Buzancy occupying a key position was the objective close at hand. She sat upon an eminence commanding the entire country, and was thus the last and most formidable remaining stronghold in the pathway to Sedan. It had become familiar talk of the sages "that he who takes Buzancy takes Sedan." Barricourt, with its dominating crest, was another point that had to be reckoned with. To whip in and turn the woods north of Grandpre, and thus effect a junction with the Fourth Army of the French, finished the program. The Bourgogne lay to the north of the Argonne, and in the effectiveness of its defenses was second only to the Argonne. It is separated from it by the narrow valley of the Aire River, which here turns directly to the west.

The Army was now on the "whale back," on the great divide, the top of the world, so to speak, as far as the world by it could be seen and be known. It was a down-hill run from the "whale back" to the end of the race.

The disposition of the corps on the front was the same as at the beginning. The extreme left, Maj. Gen. James E. Dickman, corps commander, commanding the Eightieth, Seventy-seventh, and New York-New Jersey-Pennsylvania boys, the Seventy-eighth National Army, Maj. Gen. John H. McRae, division commander.

The Fifth or center, Maj. Gen. Charles P. Summerall, corps commander, with the Eighty-ninth, the Missouri-Kansas National Army boys, Maj. Gen. William M. Wright commanding, and the Second Regulars, Maj. Gen. John A. Lejune commanding.

The Third Corps on the extreme right, Maj. Gen. John L. Hines, corps commander, with the Fifth Regulars, Maj. Gen. Hanson E. Ely, and the Ninetieth National Army—the tall, superb Texas-Oklahoma boys, with Maj. Gen. Henry T. Allen in command.

The forest fell before this advance. They took every crest, every den, every rock behind which a machine gun could hide and fire. From the first it was almost a dash. If there is such a thing as an Army steeplechase, we have it in the last 10 days of this campaign. The Forty-second relieved the Seventy-eighth in the Fifth Corps and the First took over the place of the Eightieth. The Thirty-second relieved the Fifteenth French Colonials east of the Meuse and the pell-mell continued. Every day, every hour, with the soil that passed under their feet, brought the boys nearer to victory and to home. All the divisions, save those on the extreme left, began well-defined curves toward the east, where lay the Meuse River. The Fifth Division made the river, crossed it, and plunged into the fleeing hosts a distance of nearly 7 miles. The Ninetieth hit the river to the north of the Fifth; the Eightieth still farther north; then the Second, First, and Seventy-seventh to the northward in order. The Seventy-seventh struck the river at Brazillis on the hilltop, where the outskirts of Sedan could be seen in the distance.

THE END.

The German armies were fairly "dissolving" before the onrushing Yanks. Peasants, wild-eyed, stood by the roadsides, dancing with joy, or stupefied into silence as the steady stream of fleet-footed Americans swept the country as far as the eye could reach. [Applause.]

The thunder of the greater guns to the southeast, to the west, and to the southwest told these poor people that the world was coming back to its good old form, and that in the coming the Yanks were there. [Applause.] The Twenty-sixth, those New England boys; the Seventy-ninth; the Ninetieth; the Eighty-first, the Tennessee-Carolina boys, those tall, nervous fellows; the Thirty-second, Thirty-third, and the Fifth Regulars were by that time all east of the Meuse River, swinging the iron bands which soon were to close upon what was left of Bavaria's, of Saxony's, and of Pomerania's armies.

The great white ghost of defeat was stalking the Brandenburg gate at Berlin by day and haunting the Imperial Palace of the "all highest" by night. Like the doomed criminal, this man knew the gallows was completed. This man who had attempted to strangle the world and rob it of its freedom, like all his evil brethren, hoping against hope, lipped out the supplicating prayer of the lost. [Applause.]

It was useless for the Army to go farther, for the white flag, set up by German hands, was flying over Sedan. [Applause.]

The eleventh hour of the eleventh day of the eleventh month had come, the house of Hohenzollern fell, and all Germany, military and civil, went down in a crash.

The Forty-second had kept going, and now was looking down on Sedan, a scene never to be forgotten! A living landscape of green fields, villages, the river, and beyond lay the goal, the Mecca of all this awful struggle. There lay the railway, winding its way eastward between the hills, the four-ply cable tow which bound the north, the south, and the east of the enemy land to its now shattered and crumpled west.

The order came for the Forty-second to halt. To the French poilus should be given the honor of entering the historic city of Sedan. To the French, who had sacrificed her best of blood, her smoothest of limb, and her truest of heart, should fall the grave but welcome privilege of carrying her own flag to the citadel of her once powerful but now beaten and broken enemy.

Sedan day! Oh the irony of time—Sedan day, for 48 years a national holiday on the land of the Rhine, was now to become on this the 11th day of November, 1918, the day of the world's rejoicing. [Applause.]

May it always so remain.

Such is the fate which leads ambition over into the chasm of time. Such is the wreckage which cruel peoples become. It ought to be a warning to nations until the end of time. [Applause.]

The joy, if such there be in war, is in the victory—the triumph of the cause. One thousand five hundred square kilometers of territory, including 150 villages, were liberated by the Americans; 26,000 prisoners, some war weary and worn, some dazed, stupefied, others supercilious—all shades and kinds, a motley crew—were gathered in from day to day. Nearly a thousand cannons of every kind and over 3,000 machine guns, together with vast quantities of stores, fell into the hands of the victors. Twenty-two American divisions, aggregating 632,000 men, and 4 French divisions, aggregating 138,000, had met and overcome 46 of the enemy divisions, aggregating 610,000 men—a quarter of the entire German armies in the field—and they had the advantage of fighting from positions not only naturally strong but strengthened by every device known to military science, and stabilized for over four years. The American soldier and the American officer had won their spurs in winning the victory which won the war. He will wear them with full honor before the world forever. [Applause.]

But now I turn to the saddest part, the corollary of victory as it is of all war. The bells of eternity in the 47 days had tolled out the lives of over 20,000 of our countrymen, the young, the virile, and the brave. One hundred and seventeen thousand fell wounded.

May those who fell lie buried on the field of their honor and glory, there to remain until the Great Comforter shall sound His call of the resurrection and the life; the embodiment of that precious promise that if a man die he shall live again. [Loud applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to my colleague [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, should the committee's action with regard to the taxing feature of the present bill be attacked on the floor of the House when the bill is read under the five-minute rule, I shall then assist in defending the committee's action, although I am not a member of the committee. I sincerely hope that their action in doing away with the old half-and-half taxation provision which has been in force so long in the District will be upheld.

I do not care to take up further time of the committee, as it is late. Therefore I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back nine minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13266) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 316. Joint resolution relating to supervision of the Lincoln Memorial.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LAYTON, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the subject of the Washington schools that I have just spoken on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 27, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 27, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pray Thee to make us profoundly sensible of those spiritual forces by which Thou art sifting the true from the false. Help us to give large, generous hospitality to every noble impulse that Thou dost inspire within our hearts, that all the forces of righteousness may enter into shaping our character, holding and erecting our personal life, guiding our steps in the paths of largest usefulness. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (George A. Sanderson) read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., March 27, 1920.

To the SENATE:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. CHARLES CURTIS, a Senator from the State of Kansas, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
President pro tempore.

Mr. CURTIS thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer for the day.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. OVERMAN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7656) to repeal the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, and to provide for the disposition of all property acquired under and by virtue of the same, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LANGLEY, Mr. ELLIOTT, and Mr. CLARK of Florida managers of the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Presiding Officer:

S. 2085. An act relating to the maintenance of actions for death on the high seas and other navigable waters;

S. 3472. An act for the relief of the New Jersey Shipbuilding & Dredging Co., of Bayonne, N. J.; and

H. J. Res. 316. Joint resolution relating to supervision of the Lincoln Memorial.

EDWARD L. DOHENY.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, yesterday during a speech the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], on the authority of the New York World, stated that Edward L. Doheny, of California, was one of the contributors to the fund for the campaign of Gen. Wood, and the Senator, not knowing whether the statement was true or not, saw fit to give it to the Senate upon the theory that it had been made several days before and had not been denied.

Mr. Doheny is a distinguished and honorable citizen of California, affiliated with the Democratic Party, and will be a delegate to the San Francisco convention, and he is naturally indignant at the reflections made by the Senator from Idaho, who should have sought verification of his suspicions by writing Mr. Doheny direct, as has been his custom in getting expressions from public men. The Senate should not be made a forum for misrepresentation, either intentional or accidental.

Mr. Doheny is very much concerned about the statement and desires to enter a denial; and I ask that the Secretary may read from the desk his telegram just received by me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be read.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., March 27, 1920.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The article published in the New York World stating that I am a contributor to the Gen. Wood campaign fund is a falsehood made out of whole cloth. I have not made any such contribution. I have not been requested to make any contribution, either to the Gen. Wood fund or that of any other candidate, and I have not made any contribution to any such fund. Senator BORAH'S remarks about me in this respect are hence unfounded, unwarranted, and without basis. Can you with propriety make a refutation of these slanders for me on the floor of the Senate?

Sincerely, yours, EDWARD L. DOHENY.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair presents a petition signed by a large number of American citizens residing in Warsaw, Poland, praying for immediate action looking to relief for Poland. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota presented petitions of the congregations of the First Congregational Church and the First Methodist Church and of sundry citizens, all of Sioux Falls, in the State of South Dakota, praying for the recognition by the United States of a republican form of government for Armenia, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Y., and Atlanta, Ga., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. SPENCER submitted an amendment proposing that in the establishment, operation, and maintenance of an aeroplane mail service between New York and California other routes be established as may be more economical or efficient, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (at 12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.). The morning business is closed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 11578, the Post Office appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11578) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with amendments.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, and that the bill may be read for action upon the amendments of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 4, line 15, after the word "appropriated," to strike out "and made available"; in line 16, after the word "Treasury," to strike out "of the United States"; and in line 17, after the word "appropriated" to insert "to be available immediately," so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase of that tract of land adjoining the Post Office Department Mail Equipment Shops Building in the city of Washington, D. C., on which the Post Office Department now holds an option, the sum of $25,700 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available immediately.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 22, on page 4.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads agreed to an amendment here which was inadvertently omitted in the printing of the bill. I send the amendment to the desk and ask to have it inserted on page 4 at the end of line 22.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING POSTMASTERS BY THE POSTMASTER GENERAL INSTEAD OF BY BONDING COMPANIES.

Provided, That whenever the office of a postmaster becomes vacant through death, resignation, or removal the Postmaster General shall designate some person to act as postmaster until a regular appointment can be made by the President, and the Postmaster General shall notify the Auditor for the Post Office Department of the change. The postmaster so appointed shall be responsible under his bond for the safekeeping of the public property of the post office and the performance of the duties thereof until a regular postmaster has been duly appointed and qualified and has taken possession of the office. Whenever vacancies occur from any cause, examinations of applicants to determine eligibles shall be held without delay, and the Postmaster General shall recommend to the President the appointment of the person entitled to same promptly upon being advised of the result of such examination.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The object of this provision is to allow the Postmaster General to appoint an acting postmaster in the case of a vacancy instead of leaving the appointment to the surety company. All parties are agreed that it is in the interest of expedition and efficiency, and I know of no objection to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator if it is the intention under this provision where the Postmaster General appoints a postmaster for any post office that the new appointee will give bond and release the bondsmen of the postmaster who had resigned or whose office through death became vacant?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The old bondsmen are not released. The bond simply is transferred. Heretofore the surety company has made the appointment and it indemnifies the Government for losses which may arise out of the appointment of the new postmaster who takes charge of the office.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that there are a good many bondsmen who are outside of the surety companies. In fact, I understand that more than half the postmasters give individual bonds. If that is the case, I wonder whether the original bondsmen would be held responsible for any act of the new man appointed. In the past the practice has been that the bondsmen have named the man to fill the place, and they then were responsible until a new postmaster was appointed and a new bond obtained. Under this provision there is nothing to provide that there shall be a release of the old bondsmen upon the appointment of the new postmaster. I was wondering what would be the regular routine work in case a new appointment was made.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The department has informed me that the bondsmen still will be held, and that they will be responsible for any losses which may occur under the new postmaster up to the time when a permanent postmaster is appointed.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be a rather dangerous practice, I think.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I asked the representatives of the surety companies if they had any objection to this plan, and they said not at all. They have had difficulty sometimes themselves in selecting a man to act as postmaster. It has been the great difficulty to get the right party to act as postmaster in the interim.

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize that; and I recognize also that perhaps the surety companies would not object to the provision, because a surety company would immediately enter into an examination of the character of the man, and perhaps they would object to him and see that there was a new appointment made immediately. But suppose the Senator from Michigan and myself were upon the bond of a postmaster of one of the great cities. The bonds would be heavy, and we would go on the bond because of the fact that we had absolute confidence in the man who was appointed postmaster. If he should die, and the Postmaster General, upon his death, should appoint a man in whom we had no confidence whatever, in fact, one whom we believed to be a dishonest man, and who might not be fitted for the place in our judgment, under this provision we would be held responsible for whatever action that man might take until there was a regular postmaster appointed and a bond given for him.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have some doubt as to whether we would be held responsible, unless we had been consulted and approved of it. If we entered into a contract in the form of a bond to indemnify the Government for the failure of some particular man to perform his duty and the man died, we would be responsible until the time of his death at least. If the Government puts somebody else in his place, as this amendment authorizes the Government to do, then, unless the bondsmen acquiesce in the arrangement that the surety shall be transferred to the new officer, I am quite confident myself that the bondsmen would not be held.

Mr. SMOOT. Would it not be safer, then, to include in the proposed amendment a provision something like this, that the Postmaster General is authorized to make the appointment subject to the approval of the bondsmen of the former postmaster?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think it is necessary to do that, because the Government is not going to take any chances in putting a man into an office of trust without being indemnified by bondsmen, and this will be done without any question, in my judgment.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, does not the amendment contemplate that the new appointee is to give a bond?

Mr. SMOOT. It does not say so.

Mr. NELSON. I understood it to be that way from the reading.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the proposed amendment does not say so.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; it does not say that the new man shall give a bond, except that under the general statute all postmasters shall give bond, and therefore every postmaster must give it when he is appointed. He will undoubtedly make arrangements with the old bondsmen, if he can, and the surety companies tell me that that will always be done, and the bondsmen themselves want to have it done. They say that no trouble will be experienced in that respect.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the trouble will come from the surety companies, wherever a postmaster gets his bond from a surety company, but I know the practice in my State is that individuals give the bonds, and they are accepted here by the Post Office Department, and I know that wherever there is a death those bondsmen take charge, and I know that they select a postmaster until the Postmaster General makes a regular appointment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think in some cases the bonds themselves provide that the surety shall give bond for the officer and his successors until a permanent successor is appointed. That whole question was gone over in the committee, and I do not think that the Government is taking any risk by this provision.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply felt that I ought to call the Senator's attention to it, because I can see that under the wording of the amendment some trouble might come to a bondsman. But I suppose that there may be rules and regulations adopted by the Post Office Department that will cover that situation. I should think, at least, that that is what the department would do.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 19 on page 12.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to appear on page 12, after line 19.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 12, after line 19, it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That that part of the act of July 2, 1918, providing that there shall not be allowed for the use of any third-class post office for rent a sum in excess of $500 nor more than $100 for fuel and light in any one year is hereby repealed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I will say to the Senate that the object of that amendment is to permit the Postmaster General at this time to increase in some cases the allowance of third-class post offices to an amount in excess of $500 for rent and $100 for fuel. It is absolutely essential that that should be done. Third-class post offices are having a great deal of trouble in maintaining their force and in meeting the expenses of the offices. Therefore the department has asked that the limitation which was adopted in 1918 be removed, so that more than $500 in one case or more than $100 in the other may be allowed.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I merely rise to say that I am very glad the Senator from Michigan has offered the amendment. I have received a great many letters from my constituents stating that the allowance received by postmasters for the purposes indicated is absolutely inadequate. Of course, the Postmaster General is helpless to relieve the situation because of the existing law. I simply rise to say that I heartily approve of the amendment which has been proposed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Michigan think that there ought to be some limit as to this allowance? Would it not be better to increase the limit fixed by existing law rather than to throw the matter wide open and to allow the Postmaster General to pay whatever he may desire?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not discovered in all the experience I have had with the Post Office Department any disposition on its part to pay more than the post offices really require or more than the clerks should have by way of compensation.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator from Michigan as to that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Every disposition has been shown to take advantage of every technicality even to reduce the appropriations which have been made by Congress for specific purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator as to the position which has been taken by the present Postmaster General; he is watching every dollar of expenditure just as closely as anyone could; but if the limitation is entirely repealed, with no limitation remaining, as we can not tell who is going to be the next Postmaster General or what his policy will be, I think there ought to be a limit of some kind. That is the reason why I asked the question. If, however, the Senator from Michigan thinks that it is perfectly safe without a limit, well and good.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may make a suggestion, I know that in many of the little villages and small towns in Ohio there has been a tremendous increase in population and the buildings have not proportionately increased, so that what might be a reasonable rental in one village would not be reasonable in another. So I do not think we should fix any hard-and-fast rule in this case, but that the matter should be left to the administration of the proper officials of the department.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let me say in reply to the Senator from Ohio that if the suggestion of the Senator from Utah is adopted, and we should, for instance, fix a limit of $1,000 for rent and a limit of expenditure for fuel at $200, that would be quite likely to be construed as the minimum in each case. There are instances where post offices do not need very much more than they are getting, but in the majority of cases they need an additional sum, which, as the Senator from Ohio has suggested, varies very materially in different localities.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's amendment affects only third-class post offices?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say to the Senator from Ohio that I had no idea of having a hard-and-fast rule, but I thought there ought to be a limit, just as there was fixed two years ago a limit of $500 in the matter of rentals. I think that $500 is too small an amount for rent, and I think that $100 is too small an amount for fuel; but if the limit is taken off then the power of the Postmaster General would be entirely unrestricted.

Mr. POMERENE. There are many more third-class post offices than there are either second or first-class post offices, and it seems to me there will be found very great difficulty in proper administration if a limitation is attempted to be placed upon this particular class of expenditures.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, does the Senator from Utah suggest any figure that may be put in the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the figures the Senator just named were about right, namely, double the amount now provided by existing law, so that the limit would be $1,000 for the rent of buildings and $200 for the item of fuel.

Mr. TOWNSEND. My only answer to the Senator is that that same point came up; I had it in mind as the Senator had it in mind and made that suggestion. The department would be perfectly willing to have any reasonable limitation fixed, but, as I have said, I have no fear of such a provision being abused, and I am inclined to think that if we are going to have in view economy of administration in the department we could not do better perhaps than to leave this matter with the Postmaster General.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I presume if it shall be abused the law can be amended.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It can be readily amended each year.

Mr. SMOOT. The only objection to that is that it takes Congress so long to find out when an abuse exists in any of the departments; but I will run the chance of that, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 4 on page 13, the last item being as follows:

For pay of substitutes for letter carriers absent with pay, and of auxiliary and temporary letter carriers at offices where city delivery is already established, including increases hereinafter provided, $9,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may have the attention of the chairman of the committee, I assume from some statement that was made here, I think by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], some time ago, that there will be a further provision for the payment of bonuses in addition to the compensation paid to carriers and to post-office clerks.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads took the House bill as it was presented to them and adopted it, so far as it related to salaries. That bill includes the increase or special compensation which was granted by the regular Post Office appropriation act of last year, and also by the emergency bill, which was passed in November last. We include in this year's appropriation that additional compensation, so that the clerks will not only receive the basic salary as fixed by law, but will receive next year all of the additional compensation which was granted last year by the regular appropriation bill and by the emergency bill of November.

Mr. POMERENE. So that their actual compensation during the ensuing fiscal year will be the same as it is during the current fiscal year.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It will be the same as it is now.

Mr. SMOOT. With the exception of the annual raise that comes to all of the post-office clerks.

Mr. TOWNSEND. With the addition of the regular promotions that occur under the law.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps the Senator from Ohio has in mind a statement made by me in regard to the clerks taken over under the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, who were formerly employed in the Railroad Administration in connection with transporting the mails. Those particular employees will be put in the regular classes of department clerks, namely, 1, 2, 3, 4, and so forth, and will draw the regular salaries of their respective grades, and will receive the $240 bonus as employees of various departments do. It is my intention when that matter is reached, I will say to the chairman of the committee, to ask to have the amount here appropriated reduced by the amount that we shall pay in the other bills to those employees.

Mr. POMERENE. I was a little confused about this matter because the statement had been made in the public press that in the other House the bonus had been denied in one of the bills, and when that subject came up accidentally here in the Senate I asked some questions about it. I understood afterwards that the so-called bonus was going to be restored, and I was under the impression that it related to all of the departments.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That does not relate to the Post Office Department. We carry in this bill the special or additional appropriations for that purpose. I wish to say, if the Senator is through and will permit me, that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is not satisfied that the postal employees are receiving adequate compensation, even with the additional compensation which was granted last year. We know that the department is to-day suffering because of the separation from the service of employees who are absolutely needed for the efficient conduct of the department. The last Congress, however, provided for a joint commission, consisting of five Senators and five Members of the House, and authorized that commission to investigate and report on the readjustment of postal salaries. Our late beloved and distinguished colleague, Senator Bankhead, was chairman of that commission. For some time he was sick, and finally, as you know, he passed away. The work of this commission was greater than was anticipated, and with the delays that were necessary a report could not be made in time for consideration in connection with this bill. Therefore your committee felt that it was unwise to attempt to increase salaries or to adjust salaries with our present information.

This commission is expected to report at as early a time as possible, and it is my opinion that it will then be absolutely necessary that the Congress shall take up the question of salaries in the Post Office Department. I had hoped that the bill which the Senator from South Dakota has been advocating, namely, the retirement bill, would become a law, or something similar to it. It would offer something of an inducement for people to remain in Federal employment. As it is now, the wages paid are not attractive to a vast number of postal employees, and they would not stay in the service longer were it not for the hope that there is going to be retirement and that when this commission reports there will be a readjustment of salaries.

Aside from the inadequacy of the salaries themselves there is the grossest discrimination in the Post Office Department as between employees. Some of the people who do the most responsible work, who carry the greatest responsibility and are of the greatest value to the department, are paid relatively less than some of the employees who carry very little responsibility, and we had hoped to get this report in time for this bill. I repeat, however, that it has not been received, and I fear it will not reach us at this session of Congress, if it shall adjourn by the 1st of June.

I will say, however, in order that it may be understood by the employees generally, that as soon as this report is in, if it demonstrates what I think it will demonstrate—namely, the inadequacy of salaries—I shall insist, as a member of the Post Office Committee, on taking up and adjusting the salary question, not only in the interest of the employees themselves, but in the interest of the Post Office Department, which I think to-day is suffering materially from the lack of proper compensation to its employees.

So I say to the Senator from Ohio that we have left the compension as it is now being currently paid, as it was provided for last year. We are continuing it for the coming year, or until such a time, at least, as the Congress can act and readjust the pay.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am very decidedly of the opinion that all of these salaries should be increased; and if it is not done the service is going to suffer more in the future than it has during the last year or two. No man can have been in touch with conditions, particularly in industrial centers, without realizing that the patrons of the post office are not receiving the service they ought to receive; and it is not due to any desire not to give the proper service, but it is due to the fact that many of the most efficient employees are entering other lines of activity because they are better paid.

I have had a number of letters bearing upon this subject. Some of them I have not as yet had time even to read, because they have come in within the last day or two, but I have one letter before me, and this comes to me in answer to an inquiry which I sent out myself, and if there is any impropriety in this information being sent to me, I am responsible for it.

In the Youngstown (Ohio) post office they have had the following resignations during the last year:

Twenty-one regular clerks.
Eighteen temporary substitute clerks.
Fourteen regular carriers.
Forty-four temporary substitute carriers.
Four laborers.
Seven motor-vehicle employees.

Making a total of resignations in this one post office during the last year one 108.

The post office in Youngstown is paying, I believe, 60 cents an hour for temporary employees. This is a lower figure than is paid by private business concerns in the city of Youngstown. Common laborers there are paid at the rate of 75 cents per hour.

It is quite apparent that we can not get the right kind of ability and the right kind of activity in the public service if we are going to continue paying these men and women at the present rates; and I am a good deal disappointed that the committee has not been able to come to some conclusion as to what these increases should be and provide for them in this legislation.

The Senator has referred to the retirement bill. I, too, hope that some retirement bill will be passed; but whatever differences of opinion there may be upon that subject, it seems to me that all students must agree that the salaries should be fixed independently of any retirement system. The retirement system, of course, is going to relieve all of the departments so far as their superannuates are concerned. They will be provided for under either system which is now pending before the Senate.

if either one is adopted; and I hope that there will be some definite legislation upon that subject.

I think the same may be said of many of the post offices. For instance, take the postmasters themselves. The city of Youngstown, which 10 years ago had probably 70,000 population, now has nearly 200,000 population. The receipts of that office have grown by leaps and bounds. The compensation has not increased. The same may be said of the post office at Akron, where in 1910 they had a population of 69,000. The population now is over 200,000. The post office is so crowded that the men who are now employed can not perform the right kind of service; but that is a matter that we can not take care of in this bill. I was hoping that something might be done toward taking care particularly of the carriers and the clerks, and I trust it will be done. If it can not be done in this bill, I trust it will be done very soon.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as a member of the commission which is at work upon this matter of readjusting the postal salaries, I think it proper for me to make this statement:

Our commission has taken a vast amount of testimony. It has held hearings all over the country. It has taken a great deal of testimony, which has been printed, and we have had experts go over it. We have heard every side and every phase of each question involved as to each class of offices, and we have made good progress, but we are not yet ready to report. I imagine it will probably be a month or six weeks before the commission can report its findings to the Senate and to the House. I believe that when a report is made the inequalities will be stricken out, adjustments will be made, and salaries will be raised, so that justice may be done the employees. There is no doubt from the testimony before us they are entitled to a substantial increase in salaries. I am heartily in favor of increasing them.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McKELLAR. In just one moment.

I have noticed also a desire upon the part of all the members of the commission to be exactly fair and just toward the employees, and at the same time careful of the Government's interests in the matter; and I have no doubt that when the commission does report, it will be such a report as will be satisfactory, generally speaking, and will at once become the law.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, while not anticipating the final report of the commission, I assume, then, that it is at least tentatively the opinion of the Senator from Tennessee and the opinion of the other commissioners that there ought to be a very substantial increase in these salaries over and above the salaries which the employees are now receiving.

Mr. McKELLAR. I believe it is the consensus of opinion upon the part of the commission that there ought to be a substantial increase in salaries. I think I can say that it is going to be intelligently done, and I hope the Congress will at once ratify what we do.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. McKELLAR. The information is there, and we have not contented ourselves with looking after it ourselves only, but we have gotten experts to give us the benefit of their advice, and to marshal our testimony, and to present the questions to us in such a way that it is my belief that if such a system of compensating our employees is adopted it will be to the best interest of the service and of the Government, and fair, likewise, to the employees of the Post Office Department. We hope to get the approval of Congress and of the country.

I regret very much that the commission has not been able to report before this time; but the job is a big one, far larger than we expected when we were appointed on this commission. I think, though, that it will be for the benefit of the service to have proper time taken, so that our report, when it comes in, will be effective and will be fair and just.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think any Senator who has given any study to the payment to the employees of the Post Office Department will acknowledge that they are the poorest-paid employees of the Government, with the single exception of some of the old employees in the old departments of our Government.

Another thing about the employees of the Post Office Department is that they have no time to loaf. They work all the time that is required of them by the Government, and in many cases overtime without any compensation whatever. I want to say now that if some of these new bureaus that have been created since the war received the amount of work from their employees that the employees of the Post Office Department give the Government of the United States, one-half of all the employees in those new bureaus could be discharged, and the work would be done a great deal better.

I say that without a moment's hesitation, and I am hoping for the day to come when the employees of the Government will be paid for the work that they do. When that time comes the Government of the United States can pay all of its employees more than they are being paid to-day; and not only will it be better for the employees, but it will save hundreds of millions of dollars to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that it is the purpose of this commission to pay the men for the work they do, and to pay them what is fair and just for the work actually done.

Mr. SMOOT. And that ought to be done not only by the Government, but by every institution employing men, I do not care what the character of the work may be.

I had intended when I rose to speak upon another subject, but I do not believe I will take the time of the Senate now to do it. I can do it at some other time, when an appropriation bill is not before the Senate, and it will be just as appropriate as my remarks would be upon this bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, while discussing this subject, I desire to call attention to another incongruity in these salaries, so far as the postmasters are concerned.

In the city of Akron the postmaster now gets a salary of $6,000. The city has a population of about 200,000. In the city of Youngstown the population is about 175,000 or, perhaps, 200,000. The postmaster gets only $3,800, and certainly he is underpaid, considering his responsibilities. The same is true at Canton. There is no postmaster in Ohio who draws any of the salaries provided between the Youngstown office and the Akron office. A first-class office, doing $40,000 of business a year, pays $3,000 in salary to the postmaster. The Youngstown office, doing about $400,000 business annually, pays only $3,800. The Youngstown postmastership and others of the same class, including Canton, are worth less to-day than they were 25 years ago. It seems to me that there ought to be a readjustment of these salaries all along the line, but that was not my purpose in rising in the first instance, because I felt that we ought to take care of the employees at the present time, and provide for this increase now.

Mr. McKELLAR, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. STERLING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. In making the statement I did a moment ago about the work of the commission I neglected to state that we are all very much in hopes that we can arrive at a conclusion and make a report in time for this Congress to enact the measure into a law before we adjourn.

Mr. KIRBY. Is it contemplated that the salaries of the third and fourth class postmasters shall be increased, or the central accounting postmasters of the different counties?

Mr. TOWNSEND. We make provision for increase for third and fourth class postmasters. We carry the same provision that we had in the emergency bill last year.

Mr. KIRBY. Temporarily?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Temporarily we carry that over. There has been no readjustment this year of the law governing the salaries of postmasters. Those are controlled entirely by the receipts of the office, and it is under the control of the Post Office Department as to what the salaries shall be. The third and fourth class postmasters will get the additional compensation which we granted them under the emergency appropriation last November.

Mr. KIRBY. But there is no recommendation in the commission's report for changing the law relative to the other classes of postmasters?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is no rule which governs the commission in its report. It will report what it finds. It has complete authority to investigate the whole realm of postal salaries and postal duties, and the idea is that it will finally report to Congress what it finds and what it believes is proper as a readjustment of salaries.

What the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and others stated is true. For instance, we found in the city of New York a certain supervisory officer there who has some 600 people under his charge who gives his personal bond of $50,000 a year for the performance of his duty and who handles millions of dollars of public money every year. He gets a salary of $2,700 a year. Evidently the position should command twice that amount.

So we find existing everywhere throughout the service inadequate, unjust compensation, and I would to-day be here advocating the passage of a bill increasing the salaries of postal employees if I were confident as to how the increases should be made, and if it were not probable that we would simply perpetuate the injustices which already exist. I want to have them cured.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, as a member of the commission to which reference has been made, the commission for the adjustment of salaries and compensation of post-office employees, I want to say just a word. I quite agree with what the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] have stated in regard to the cause of the delay in the work and in the report of this commission. I might say, in addition, that I doubt if during the life of any important commission of Congress Senators have had more of other important duties to perform. Senators will realize the extraordinary amount of business and the importance of the business that has been before the Senate during almost the entire life of this commission; and this should be borne in mind, in addition to what has already been said about causes for delay.

But, Mr. President, my interest, in the first place, in the compensation of post-office employees was confined largely to the compensation of the rural and city carriers. I myself at one time furnished some statements that went into the RECORD showing how rural carriers were running behind year after year, and did not have enough out of their salaries to pay the expenses of maintaining their equipment and the necessary expenses of their families.

However, the work of this commission has opened my eyes to some other gross injustices in the matter of compensation. For example, in the city of New York, in hearing the testimony of carriers and postal clerks there, we found men who were unable to maintain themselves and their families without extra work outside, or the work performed by the wives of those men in keeping boarders or renting rooms; and this they were obliged to do in order that they might live. Many of them were running in debt, running behind year after year.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will permit me, when the bill was pending before the Senate providing for the payment of bonuses, I presented some data from Columbus carriers and clerks along the same line as that indicated by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Exactly.

Mr. POMERENE. There can not be any question on that point. I realize that we can not adjust all of these matters now; but, in view of what I am sure is the sentiment of the chairman of the committee, I have been hoping, so far as the carriers and clerks are concerned, that we might make some provision now for an increase so as to keep it within such proper limits as he might conceive them to be, and later have them modified, if its modification is necessary, when the report of the commission is presented. I think it would be an encouragement to these men to continue on in the service if we were to do that now.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, as a member of this commission I wish to say that I want to do everything I possibly can, as I believe every other member of the commission will do, to expedite the work of the commission and a final report to Congress.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, I want to remind the Senator from South Dakota that the Postal Commission, of which I am a member, found that the same condition prevails in every other city in this country as that which he has stated prevails in New York, and the testimony will show that the postal employees receive less compensation than the employees in other branches of the Government service.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I have no doubt but what the Senator speaks the exact truth in regard to that matter. I was able to visit but two cities, New York and Atlanta. I regretted very much that I could not visit more, but my work here was such just at that time that I could not get away.

Further, Mr. President, notwithstanding it all, there is one thing with which I have been impressed, and that is the morale and the spirit of faithful service and pride in their work shown by the men in the Postal Service. It has been wonderful, and I think that might well be a consideration when we come to fixing the compensation to which they are entitled.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General," on page 14, line 20, after the word "otherwise," to insert "Provided further, That the Postmaster General may contract with any individual, firm, or corporation for an aeroplane mail service between such points as he may deem advisable and designate, in case such service is furnished at a cost not materially greater than the cost of the same service by rail, and shall pay therefor out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes," so as to make the clause read:

For inland transportation by railroad routes, including increases hereinafter provided, $60,000,000: Provided, That not to exceed $1,250,000 of this appropriation may be expended for pay of freight and incidental charges for the transportation of mails conveyed under special arrangement in freight trains or otherwise: Provided further, That the Postmaster General may contract with any individual, firm, or corporation for an aeroplane mail service between such points as he may deem advisable and designate, in case such service is furnished at a cost not materially greater than the cost of the same service by rail, and shall pay therefor out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question about this provision. Would it permit the Postmaster General to enter into a contract for carrying the mail, for instance, from Seattle to points in Alaska?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think it would. Any fund for inland transportation could be used for this purpose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I remember in the last bill, I think, there was an appropriation made for experimental airplane purposes, and the Senate put a provision in expressly authorizing that money to be used in Alaska as well as in this country. I do not find any provision of that sort in this bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is a specific route there. There is nothing in the bill anywhere for airplane experimental purposes?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not on the part of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I read the amendment I understand that it is to be paid out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes. In other words, it does not limit the route that may be taken by the airplane service, but it does provide that it shall be paid out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And it is to be not materially greater than the cost of the same service by rail.

Mr. SMOOT. There must be some limitation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, there is no rail service between any point in this country and Alaska.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; but——

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator thinks, however, that he could use some of this money for that purpose under this provision.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Did the committee think that it was inadvisable to make any provision for experimental purposes?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; the committee did so think. That will come up when we get to the other provision, but if you prefer I will discuss it with you now. We are now considering the question as to whether we will authorize the Post Office Department to enter into contracts with individuals or corporations or concerns for carrying the mails instead of entering into a railroad contract for carrying them. The Government does not embark in the proposition under this paragraph; we have stricken out in the next provision but one.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is a specific route there?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is a specific route.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand that, but I wondered why the committee left out any provision for experimental purposes. For instance, take the situation with reference to Alaska. We do not know just what the expense would be, we do not know just what the difficulties might be in order to get a private party to make an experimental attempt to carry mail to Alaska. They might ask a sum of money that would be so much greater than the cost for similar transportation by mail that the Pastmaster General would feel that he did not have authority under this act to do it, although he might deem it desirable to do it as an experiment, to see what could be done. It seems to me that we ought to have something under which a service of that kind could be put into effect and to demonstrate whether or not it was practicable.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I say to the Senator that we had some such provision in the bill last year, and the department did not feel that it was warranted in undertaking that experiment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They probably used the money for other experimental purposes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It used all the money appropriated for practically two routes and on those routes it made some very valuable demonstrations. We propose in this bill to appropriate $1,415,000 for an experimental airplane route between New York and San Francisco via Cleveland, Chicago, and Omaha.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is not an experimental route.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is practically an experimental route.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The appropriation is not expressed in that way.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; but it is done for the purpose of meeting every possible condition of flight which is likely to be met in the United States. That route incurs high altitudes and low spots, long distances, and continued flight. It is done still along the line of experiments, because we have not demonstrated to a certainty that the airplane is just exactly what we want for carrying the mail. I shall discuss that later, but in answer to what the Senator has said, I will state that the committee did not feel, nor did the department ask, that the department should be given power to experiment with airships in carrying mail up in Alaska. There was nothing said about it, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to suggest to the Senator that the route which is provided for will not demonstrate anything with reference to Alaskan conditions. There it has to be an overwater route; that is, it has to be done by aeroplanes that will land in the water. If there is any place where aeroplane service for mail carriage is needed, it is in that Territory. I do not mean up in the interior of the Territory, but I have in mind especially from Seattle up to the principal points in southeastern Alaska.

The situation now is that the mail for that country is carried by freight and under freight conditions. We can not pay enough to warrant a regular mail service, and so the people of that Territory are dependent upon the carriage of the mail under freight conditions. It is thrown down in the hold, it gets to the places when the freight gets there, it is taken out when all the other freight is taken out, and so on. Along the route provided for people are not delayed in their mail because of lack of facilities for carrying it. We have transcontinental lines running across the country carrying the mail between points, and while this air service may be a little more expeditious and furnish facilities for certain kinds of mail and be of benefit in that way, it is really not needed.

Of course, we want to get all of the up-to-date facilities we can, but there is a section of the country where more expeditious methods are really imperative. The mail ought not to be carried by freight, if it is at all reasonably practicable to get it carried in another way. So I was in hopes that there would be some provision made so that the department might have the experiment tried there. It may not be found to be practicable. It may be that fogs or some other weather conditions, and so on, would not make it practicable; but I have talked with people out there who have been engaged in the aeroplane business, and they think it is practicable. If a proper appropriation were made so that the Post Office Department could enter into a contract for a service that would be in the nature of an experiment, I think it would be wise that it should be done. However, I am not going to offer an amendment to that effect. I find a provision in the latter part of the bill under which I suppose, possibly, the matter could be considered and investigated. There provision is made for a commission to investigate various subjects, among them the aeroplane possibilities and aeroplane service, and the commission is required to submit recommendations to Congress. I have no doubt that commission will look into the situation. So I hope from them there may come a recommendation that will be a pretty safe guide for a committee in framing its next bill. I merely wished to call attention to the situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 15, after line 5, to insert:

> For the purchase of such aeroplanes as may be necessary to establish, operate, and maintain an aeroplane mail service between New York, N. Y., and San Francisco, Calif., via Chicago, Ill., and Omaha, Nebr.; for the operation and maintenance of such aeroplanes, including stations, equipment, tools, and machinery, and other necessary incidental expenses; and for such personnel as may be necessary therefor, $1,415,000.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment which has just been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana offers an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator wait until the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana shall have been stated?

Mr. MOSES. Certainly.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 15, line 9, it is proposed to strike out the words "Chicago, Illinois, and Omaha, Nebraska," and to insert in lieu thereof "Philadelphia, Washington, Atlanta, New Orleans, Houston, and Los Angeles."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I think it is important that the Senate should understand the real situation in reference to the aeroplane service which is carried in the pending Post Office appropriation bill. Last year this bill carried an appropriation of $850,000 for this service and the department established two routes.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. Before the Senator proceeds with his discussion, I desire to say that I have an amendment which I should like to offer.

Mr. TOWNSEND. An amendment to the committee amendment has already been offered.

Mr. DIAL. I thought perhaps we might discuss the whole matter at one time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no objection to the Senator having his amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina may have his amendment read for the information of the Senate, so that it may be discussed, but the amendment would be out of order at this time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no objection to the amendment being read.

Mr. DIAL. I ask to have read the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 15, after line 13, it is proposed to insert the following paragraph:

> For the purchase of such aeroplanes as may be necessary to establish, operate, and maintain an aeroplane mail service between Boston, Mass., and Atlanta, Ga.; for the operation and maintenance of such aeroplanes, including stations, equipment, tools and machinery, and other necessary incidental expenses, and for such personnel as may be necessary therefor, $800,000.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator from Michigan be good enough to tell me whether, in his judgment, there is any objection, instead of fixing a definite route by way of Omaha, Nebr., to inserting some general language after Omaha, Nebr., to this effect, for instance, "or by such other route as may be more economical or efficient"? In other words, what is in my mind, if I may say so to the Senator, is why should we definitely by legislation establish Omaha, Nebr., as the place through which this aeroplane route must travel when it might be desirable that the air service should run to St. Joseph, Mo., or to Des Moines, Iowa, or down as far as St. Louis, Mo.?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Missouri that the reason Omaha is specified is because the existing route from New York to Cleveland and Chicago has one of its termini at Omaha. It is not yet operating there, but all arrangements have been made under the appropriations to continue the service to Omaha.

I started to say, Mr. President, that last year we appropriated $850,000 for this service, and the department established two routes, one between New York and Washington and the other between New York and Cleveland and Chicago on to Omaha. Those two routes have been operating, and I think a very commendable showing has been made by the department. It must not be forgotten, however, that this service is still experimental. I think no one assumes that it will ever be expanded so as to carry a large proportion of the mail of the country. It has, however, expedited certain classes of mail; it has made some demonstrations which are of the very greatest value to the United States, and to the world, so far as that is concerned. I have said on several occasions, and I now repeat, that I think more practical demonstrations of the use of the airplanes have been made by the Post Office Department during the nearly two years it has been operating or experimenting along this line than have been made by all the other departments of our Government put together. It has been demonstrated that certain classes of mail can be carried by airplane with reasonable regularity.

I made a statement in my report that the Postmaster General called to my attention as being an error, namely, that the department itself had acknowledged that there was no longer practical use for this service between Chicago and Washington. The Postmaster General corrects me, and I find that he is right and I was mistaken about it. He stated that so far as the mail originating in New York and delivered at Washington is concerned, it was of no great value, but the New England mail that came to New York and was there transferred to airplanes was expedited to some extent in its delivery in Washington. Your committee, however, felt that it was not warranted in recommending five projects such as the Post Office Department estimated for; that all we could hope to accomplish and desired to accomplish could be brought about by the one route between New York and San Francisco. The department recommended that we continue the line from New York to Washington and extend it on to Atlanta, as, I think, is provided in one of the amendments which have been presented. It recommended that the Chicago line be extended on to San Francisco, as we have proposed; it recommended that a line be extended from St. Louis, Mo., by way of Chicago to the Twin Cities; it also recommended that a route be established between Pittsburgh and Kansas City, and another one between Detroit, by way of Toledo, and Cleveland.

Inasmuch as this service was still experimental, inasmuch as it was absolutely necessary that we should conserve the Treasury of the United States as much as possible, inasmuch as the route from New York to San Francisco would comprehend every possible condition which could be met in continental United States in the air service, inasmuch as it involved the erection of airdromes across the country from east to west, which could be used by the Army in flying north and south, the committee felt that by its recommendation it was serving three great purposes; first, a demonstration of the use of the airplane in the mail service; second, its use as a commercial facility; and, third, its benefit as an aid to the Army for our protection in time of war. By discontinuing the line from Chicago to Washington, thereby releasing the force of men now engaged in that service and releasing as well the airplanes employed in it, we thought that we could reduce the appropriation which the department asked for the transcontinental line by about $200,000 on account of the saving we would effect, and that we could well forego all of the more local enterprises, in which is involved pride of home interests, and establish a route that would really demonstrate the possibilities of the air service.

One of the routes recommended by the department was from Detroit, in my State, by way of Toledo, to Cleveland. Our people desired it. I would like to have it established, but I did not feel it was my duty or that, as a matter of right, I was called upon to ask for an appropriation for that route now, inasmuch as I had in mind what I think the whole committee had in mind, namely, a demonstration of the value of the airplane for carrying the mail and of its use in the commercial world.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to ask the Senator a question for information and not because I have any pronounced views on this subject, because I do not have. For a considerable time after the establishment of air mail routes we heard of many individuals who sent or received letters by the air mail service; a good many were glad to have their desire for novelty satisfied in that way. I have not heard, however, of very many people who are using the airplane routes for commercial or business purposes. What information can the Senator from Michigan give to the Senate bearing upon that subject? Is it likely that the airplane will be used commercially, and for what reasons? Of course, I can understand that it may expedite to some extent the delivery of mail, but to what extent I do not know.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Only to a very small extent. I think nobody contends that the airplane will finally carry all the mail or any great proportion of it; but there are certain classes of mail that can be very materially expedited when the service runs close to schedule, and they are doing pretty well along that line now, although there is some dispute in the record as to the conditions at Cleveland, where it is claimed locally there were more missed connections than were reported by the department. I am assuming that the department is approximately correct; that demonstration has been made that airplanes can run upon reasonable schedule time, and that they can cut short in certain instances the time that is now required to carry the mails by rail. For instance, certain mail can be expedited so as to make connection with railroad trains at distant points, and thus expedite the carriage, perhaps several hours, and sometimes as much as 12 or 14 hours, according to the distance which the airplanes travel.

I repeat, however, that it is to my mind a great deal more than a mail proposition. If it were not I would not be here advocating it. I believe that it is our duty as a country to demonstrate the possible uses of the airplane. I think we are making the demonstration in the Post Office Department, and I think that the route which the committee has selected will answer every purpose for such demonstration this year. Therefore I sincerely hope that neither of the amendments which have been proposed will be adopted. If we are going to extend this appropriation and inaugurate other air routes, why not take them all in? Why not take in all the routes that have been recommended? If we are going to try to satisfy local communities and local sentiment, let us provide for all; but let us not lose sight of the condition of the Treasury. We can afford to try out the experiment we propose and we can afford to do nothing more.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I will ask the Senator another question. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] a few moments ago referred to the conditions in Alaska. If I interpret the remarks of the Senator from Michigan correctly, his belief is that the art of flying in the air is such that he is more interested in the airplane service of the Post Office Department on account of experimental purposes than for commercial purposes. I have some sympathy with him along that line; but, if we are more interested in the subject for experimental purposes, why would it not be better to establish air lines of communication with Alaska and outlying places, where we can perform a real service to the people who are living there, than to inaugurate the service along well-established routes of communication by rail and otherwise? Would not the benefit to the art of flying be just the same?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not think it would in that one particular. I think the experiment there would be desirable, but a different character of plane would be required on a route between Seattle, Wash., and Alaska. In such a service hydroplanes would have to be used, because the flying would be principally over the water. It may be that the Government will want to embark on that experiment; it may be that it will be able to take advantage of an opportunity to enter into a contract with some corporation to supply such service.

My attention has been called by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] to the fact that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], who is not now present, is interested in this subject, and would like to be here when it is determined. The Senator has not said anything to me about that, although I have talked with him concerning the service, and supposed that we were in perfect accord regarding it. I am perfectly willing, however, that this matter shall go over until we have considered the other provisions of the bill, but I should not wish to be understood as implying that, if we could pass the bill to-day, I would consent to have it go over on account of the absence of the Senator from Indiana. I would hardly feel warranted in asking that the bill go over; but, in deference to the request of the Senator, I am going to ask that this amendment be now postponed until we dispose of the other provisions of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the matter being passed over temporarily?

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, before that motion is put, I want to say that I agree with the chairman of the committee, that this is a subject which should be incorporated in this bill, and that it is most important for the mail service and also for the development of the airplane in this country, commercially and otherwise.

In offering the amendment which I presented, my idea was to encourage this work, and to have the route specified through the country where an airplane could travel the year around. The Senator from Michigan will recall that all of the great fields that were established in preparation for the war were laid out in the southern country, where climatic conditions are best, and where airplanes can fly for 12 months in the year. The northern route is one that in all probability could be used only for a few months of the year; and in presenting this amendment I do so not with the idea of local pride but to see the service extended for the benefit of a great number of people, and on a route that will prove advantageous for carrying the mail and materially develop the airplane, as well as have a trained body of men for air service in the United States.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I was on the subcommittee when this bill was being considered, but could not attend all the meetings. Since hearing the chairman of the committee, however, I recall that the department recommended a route, which I undertook to offer an amendment in favor of, from New York to Atlanta instead of from Boston to Atlanta; and therefore I asked to change the location so as to make it New York instead of Boston, as recommended by the Department. I did not hear the chairman's suggestion. What was it—to take up the question now, or what is the pleasure of the chairman?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The chairman has requested that the amendment be passed over, leaving pending the proposed Gay amendment thereto; and, unless there is objection, that will be done.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, before that is done, I should like to ask if the two amendments now are not duplications? In other words, the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] seeks to have the route from New York to Washington to Atlanta to New Orleans and then through Texas to Los Angeles and up to San Francisco. The amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] asks for a route from New York to Washington to Atlanta. Would not the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, if adopted, cover the route proposed by the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; it would.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina would not be in order now, one amendment to the proposal already being pending.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I merely consented that the amendment might be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been read.

Mr. DIAL. If the Senator will allow me there, I will state that I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the committee for the transcontinental route, and in addition to that I favor another route down here, such as I have suggested.

Mr. HENDERSON. As I understand the matter now, the chairman suggests that this particular committee amendment go over, and if we do not reach a final vote on the bill this afternoon it will come up on Monday, perhaps.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. HENDERSON. But if we do get down to a vote this afternoon, this amendment will come up later to-day?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is right, at which time I shall be very glad to have the views of the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, before we leave that section, I should like to have read an amendment which ought to be on the Secretary's desk when we do consider it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 15, line 9, after the word "Nebraska," it is proposed to insert:

Or by such other route as may be more economical or efficient.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The whole thing may be considered together when it is reached later. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. On page 16, line 17, after the word "Provided," I move to insert the word "further."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 17, line 13, after the words "post offices," to strike out "$932,156" and insert "$1,032,156," so as to read:

For rent, light, heat, fuel, telegraph, miscellaneous and office expenses, schedules of mail trains, telephone service, and badges for railway postal clerks, including rental of offices for division headquarters, and chief clerk, Railway Mail Service, in Washington, D. C., and rental of space for terminal railway post offices for the distribution of mails when the furnishing of space for such distribution can not under the Postal Laws and Regulations properly be required of railroad companies without additional compensation, and for equipment and miscellaneous items necessary and incidental to terminal railway post offices, $1,032,156.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 16, after the word "Provided," to strike out "however" and insert "further," and in line 20, after the word "otherwise," to insert "Provided further, That the compensation of clerks included within the roll known as the inland transportation roll and paid under the appropriation for inland transportation of mail shall be increased for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, as follows: (1) Those receiving $1,200 or less per annum, to be increased $200; (2) those receiving more than $1,200 and not more than $1,600 per annum, to be increased $150; (3) those receiving more than $1,600 and not more than $1,900 per annum, to be increased $125: And provided further, That such clerks included within such roll shall be credited with leave at the rate of one and one-quarter days for each month of actual service," so as to make the clause read:

For inland transportation of mail by electric and cable cars, $545,000: Provided, That the rate of compensation to be paid per mile shall not exceed the rate now paid to companies performing such service, except that the Postmaster General, in cases where the quantity of mail is large and the number of exchange points numerous, may, in his discretion, authorize payment for closed-pouch service at a rate per mile not to exceed one-third above the rate per mile now paid for closed-pouch service; and for mail cars and apartments carrying the mails, not to exceed the rate of 1 cent per linear foot per car-mile of travel: Provided further, That the rates for electric car service on routes over 20 miles in length outside of cities shall not exceed the rates paid for service on steam railroads: Provided further, That not to exceed $25,000 of the sum hereby appropriated may be expended, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, where unusual conditions exist or where such service will be more expeditious and efficient and at no greater cost than otherwise: Provided further, That the compensation of clerks included within the roll known as the inland transportation roll and paid under the appropriation for inland transportation of mail shall be increased for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, as follows: (1) Those receiving $1,200 or less per annum, to be increased $200; (2) those receiving more than $1,200 and not more than $1,600 per annum, to be increased $150; (3) those receiving more than $1,600 and not more than $1,900 per annum, to be increased $125: And provided further, That such clerks included within such roll shall be credited with leave at the rate of one and one-quarter days for each month of actual service.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I understand that the Committee on Appropriations has incorporated in its bill a provision for this class of employees; that the Post Office Department have estimated for these men, and have recommended that they be placed in the regular service, which would carry them under the head of the departmental clerks, and not as postal employees. This subject has given us no little trouble. Last year, when we tried to include all of the postal employees, we were told that these were not postal employees, but we afterwards learned that they were and tried to make some provision to correct the mistake. It appears now that the department has estimated for these men to the Committee on Appropriations, and has recommended that provision be made for the pay of 60 employees instead of 70, as was recommended to us.

I think I understand this matter correctly now, and if I do, this amendment ought to be rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator that the statement made by him is correct; that the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill that is now on the calendar provides for 60 clerks, and they are now placed upon the statutory rolls, the same as other employees that are employed in the District of Columbia. This amendment therefore should be rejected and the amount of $113,178 deducted from this appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am assuming that we now have the correct status of these employees. I have tried very hard for a year to find out what it was, and I am now acting on the supposition that it is correct and that what the department has now recommended is the right course.

I ask to go back to page 14, where the item of $60,000,000 occurs. I wish to strike that out and insert "$59,886,822," which is a reduction of $113,178 in the amount which the Post Office Department says should be deducted from the postal appropriation and paid from another appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 14, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "$60,000,000" and in lieu thereof to insert "$59,886,822."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 19, line 8, after the words "foreign mails," to insert "by steamship or otherwise," so as to make the clause read:

For transportation of foreign mails by steamship or otherwise, including increases hereinafter provided, $4,700,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Third Assistant Postmaster General," on page 19, line 24, after the words "postal cards," to strike out "$965,000" and insert "$765,000," so as to make the clause read:

For manufacture of postal cards, $765,000.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have received a protest from the department that this reduction could not be borne by the department; but the committee that had this matter in charge felt that there might be a saving of at least $200,000 in this item, so I am insisting that it shall go as the committee has reported it. The matter will go to conference, however, and while we have no disposition to cripple the Post Office Department in preparing these cards, yet it is a matter that at least I want further information on before I vacate the action of the committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. HENDERSON. There are a good many millions of postal cards on hand now, as we understood the representatives of the department, so that they could use those instead of spending all this money for new ones.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is correct; and, anyway, it is a matter that will be an open subject in conference, and the department can then place its case before the conferees.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The price of postal-card paper has increased so greatly that the expenditure of this amount of money will not purchase one-half the number of postal cards that the same amount of money would have purchased in 1916. The time may come when we can not even get the paper necessary; but I am quite sure the Postmaster General is correct when he says this amount can not be cut and the necessary postal cards furnished, if the demand for postal cards for the coming year should be equal to the demand for postal cards in years past.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Utah that the demand for postal cards fell off materially when the postage went to 2 cents and that we now have on hand a great many millions of postal cards that can be used; and we thought that instead of buying and printing new ones it would be a good plan to use those that are on hand at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. In this bill there is a provision to make postal cards and drop letters 1 cent instead of 2, and if that becomes a law there is not any question but that the use of postal cards will greatly increase.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 6, after "$10,000," to insert "Provided, That hereafter the Postmaster General may, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe, authorize postmasters to pay limited indemnity claims on insured and collect-on-delivery mail."

Mr. TOWNSEND. The amendment should be inserted after the figures "$3,000,000" in line 3. That proviso was attached to the wrong paragraph. It should be attached to the end of line 3, page 20.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Transpose the proviso found in lines 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 so that they will follow line 3. That paragraph reads:

For payment of limited indemnity for the injury or loss of pieces of domestic registered matter, insured, and collect-on-delivery mail, $3,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees of the classified civil service, and for other purposes.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in connection with the unfinished business, I simply wish to say that were there a prospect at all of getting a quorum to-day I should at least ask for a unanimous-consent agreement that some time should be fixed when the bill might be finally disposed of; but I see that it would be almost impossible, if not quite so, to get a quorum to-day, and I am not going to make that request. I want simply to give notice that at the first opportunity after the passage of the pending bill I shall ask for such a unanimous-consent agreement and try to proceed with the further consideration of the bill with all possible dispatch.

I think Senators will appreciate the difficulties we have had in the consideration of this bill. I have consoled myself with the fact that notwithstanding we have not been proceeding with the unfinished business we have been going on with other important business of the Senate; that necessary business has been transacted, notwithstanding we have not been going ahead with the unfinished business.

Now, I ask, Mr. President, that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11578) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and continued to line 11, on page 22.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to have the chairman of the committee turn to page 21, line 9, in the paragraph just read. The paragraph is "For miscellaneous equipment and supplies," and among the enumerated items we find "printing presses." That has been carried in the law for years and years past, and we have now a consolidation of the printing presses of the country, as far as possible, in the Government Printing Office. Really I think it is unnecessary to allow the words "printing presses" to be inserted. I was wondering whether it would not be wise at this time to strike out the words "printing presses."

Mr. TOWNSEND. The fact of the matter is that that is simply a repetition of the law. It has been carried for years, and, while I quite agree with the Senator that it seems to have no apparent use here, I can not understand why it would be important to strike it out. However, if the Senator wishes, I have no objection to his moving to strike it out and letting it go to conference to find out about it, although I can see no advantage to be gained by doing so.

Mr. SMOOT. The only advantage will be that if it remains in the bill the Postmaster General could begin to purchase printing presses without further action on the part of Congress.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I can not see any harm in striking it out, as far as I am concerned, and I can not see any benefit in striking out the words that have been employed for years. But I repeat that I have no objection to its going out in order that it may go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 21, line 9, after the words "duplicating machines," strike out the words "printing presses" and the comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 15, after "$2,090,000," to insert "to be immediately available," so as to read:

For the purchase, manufacture, and repair of mail bags and other mail containers and attachments, mail locks, keys, chains, tools, machinery, and material necessary for same, and for incidental expenses pertaining thereto; also material, machinery, and tools necessary for the manufacture and repair in the equipment shops at Washington, D. C., of such other equipment for the Postal Service as may be deemed expedient; for compensation to labor employed in the equipment shops at Washington, D. C., including increases hereinafter provided, $2,090,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The amendment should read "to be available immediately."

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator want all of this appropriation to be available immediately? Whatever amount out of the appropriation they want to use before July 1 ought to be made available immediately, but the way it is worded the whole appropriation could be spent by June 30, 1920.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the object of putting this provision in is to make it possible for the Post Office Department to advertise for bids and enter into contracts for the next fiscal year, which they maintain they do not have the right to do until the appropriation is available. If they had the use of the appropriation now, they could proceed to make the contracts for next year and thus economize, as they believe, very largely in the interest of the Government. That is the only object. The same action was taken in reference to an appropriation for a public building.

Mr. SMOOT. That was for the purchase of land; but for the manufacture of mail bags and numerous other items is quite different. I do not know that I have ever seen a provision of this kind, making an appropriation for the coming fiscal year to be immediately available, though it is very often done to cover deficiencies that may happen in the present fiscal year. If the Senator knew the amount that was wanted——

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is not for a deficiency. As I understand it, no part of this money is to be used in this fiscal year. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, in speaking about contracts with certain concerns to be made for the materials that are mentioned here, said in the hearing before the committee:

They have—

That is, these concerns—

better contracts with others than they have with us, and the net result is we are very short of steel for our cord fasteners and label holders and locks, and metal material of that variety right now, so if we do not have this appropriation available before the 1st of July we will be in no position to supply the necessry containers, either under contract outside or in our own shops, prior to the time we need them, about the 1st of December, next. You understand, that is the period we have the heavy rush of mail, and we supply all of the containers to all of the different departments of the service that use them. There is an emergency, in fact, in connection with the maintenance of the Postal Service and this character of equipment that goes with it. Consequently it will be essential that this appropriation be made immediately available in order that we may at once contract and place orders for metal parts and canvas thread.

He mentions some of the other items in the same way.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that is virtually a deficiency for the coming fiscal year, for the purchases they desire to make this fiscal year. All the departments of the Government use their appropriations in exactly the same way. The departments can make contracts for delivery for the year for which an appropriation is made. The testimony given there shows that they want to purchase the material and want to do it before July 1, 1920.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; they want to make contracts now. They want to enter into contracts for the purchase of goods to be delivered next year.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not so understand the statement.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think there can be any question about that.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought they were short now.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Fourth Assistant was talking about contracts with others.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will read the first part of the statement of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, he will find that he stated they are short now, and, of course, if they are short now and have to purchase now, they could not purchase out of this fund unless it were made immediately available.

Mr. TOWNSEND. He says:

Mr. Chairman, the situation that confronts us in the industrial world is astonishing. We will use in the neighborhood of 500 tons of steel. We can not secure a pound to-day under four and five months' delivery. Our contractor for steel this year, the Superior Steel Corporation, has closed down on shipments to us entirely; it being more profitable to do business in the commercial world than with the Government. That is about the size of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Why? Do they have better contracts?

Mr. BLAKSLEE. They have better contracts with others than they have with us, and the net result is we are very short of steel for our cord fasteners and label holders and locks, and metal material of that variety right now, so if we do not have this appropriation available before the 1st of July we will be in no position to supply the necessary containers, either under contract outside or in our own shops, prior to the time we need them, about the 1st of December next.

That is, when he wants them the 1st of December next, and if he can not make his contracts now he can not be in any position to supply the goods by the 1st of next December. That is the testimony, and that was the showing made before us. The probabilities are that not all of the appropriation will be required; but I do not know how much would be necessary.

Mr. SMOOT. It is the first time in all the history of appropriation bills that I have ever seen such a thing insisted upon, unless it were in an appropriation for the purchase of land or a building, or something of that kind. In a general appropriation for general expenses I have never yet seen a similar provision inserted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Has the Senator ever met with just such a condition as this, when the condition of the market is such that you can not get the goods which you order, and can not even enter into a contract to get them? The showing they made before us of their inability to get the various items of material and of supplies that they need in the Post Office Department inside of months and months was disturbing.

Mr. SMOOT. Contracts have been made by nearly every department of the Government on appropriations where the goods are to be delivered and paid for within the year in which an appropriation is made.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator maintain that a contract could be made now for next year, when the appropriation is not available?

Mr. SMOOT. If the appropriation is made for that year, they can make the contract to be delivered in the coming year and pay for it out of the appropriation for that year; but they could not make a purchase now out of this appropriation for next year, to be delivered this year, unless the fund was made available immediately. Of course, Mr. President, I have absolute confidence that the money as appropriated will be used by the Postmaster General, but there are a good many of the departments and divisions of the Government for which I would not want to see it done. I think if there was an appropriation made of this character to some of them they would spend every dollar of it before June 30 and come in for a deficiency to carry them through the whole of the coming fiscal year. But I do not think that will happen with the Post Office Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves to amend the amendment of the committee so as to read, "to be available immediately."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 25, after "$11,000,000," to strike out ": Provided, That the Secretary of War is authorized hereafter, in his discretion, to deliver and turn over to the Postmaster General, without charge therefor, from time to time such motor vehicles, aeroplanes, and parts thereof, and machinery and tools to repair and maintain the same, as may be suitable for use in the Postal Service, and the Postmaster General is authorized to use the same in the transportation of the mails and to pay the necessary expenses thereof, including the replacement, maintenance, exchange, and repair of such equipment, out of the annual appropriations for star route service," so as to make the clause read:

For inland transportation by star routes (excepting service in Alaska), including temporary service to newly established offices, $11,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 15, to strike out: "That hereafter the length of routes served by rural carriers shall be determined by the records of the department, which records shall be changed promptly whenever it shall be demonstrated to the satisfaction of the department that the length of a route has been incorrectly stated, the pay of the carrier to be increased or decreased accordingly," and insert: "That the pay of rural carriers and substitute rural carriers, which depends upon the length of the route, shall be determined in accordance with the records of the Post Office Department, which records shall be promptly corrected whenever the Postmaster General determines that such records are not correct," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of rural carriers, substitutes for rural carriers on annual leave, clerks in charge of rural stations, and tolls and ferriage, Rural Delivery Service, and for the incidental expenses thereof, including increases hereinafter provided, $78,000,000: Provided, That the pay of rural carriers and substitute rural carriers, which depends upon the length of the route, shall be determined in accordance with the records of the Post Office Department, which records shall be promptly corrected whenever the Postmaster General determines that such records are not correct.

Mr. TOWNSEND. After the word "That" in line 21 I move to insert the word "hereafter."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 24, line 21, after the word "That" in the amendment, insert the word "hereafter."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 25, after line 9, to strike out section 2 in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the increased compensation for positions in the Postal Service of all classes and grades made and provided for in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920," approved February 28, 1919, and House joint resolution of November 8, 1919, entitled "Joint resolution to provide for additional compensation for employes of the Postal Service and making appropriations therefor," and the provisions of such act and resolution relating to promotions, classification, and grades specified in said act and resolution shall continue in force during the fiscal year 1921, unless otherwise provided by law.

And in lieu to insert:

SEC. 2. That the provisions respecting compensation, classification, and grades contained in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1919, and the public resolution entitled "Joint resolution to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making appropriation therefor," House joint resolution 151, which became a law November 8, 1919, shall be in full force and effect until the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, on page 25, line 23, after the word "classification" in the committee amendment, I move to insert the word "promotions."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 26, after line 7, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 3. That the property and equipment of the pneumatic tube companies in the post-office buildings in New York, N. Y.; Brooklyn, N. Y.; Boston, Mass.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; and St. Louis, Mo., may remain where now located until June 30, 1921, or until the space occupied by such property or equipment is actually needed for post-office purposes: Provided, That no liability or expense shall be incurred by the Government hereunder.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] has sent word that he desired to be heard upon this provision, and, as I understand, he will be here within a few minutes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was going to ask that it might go over until we reached section 9. The two matters ought to be considered together.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 26, after line 16, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War is authorized hereafter, in his discretion, to deliver and turn over to the Postmaster General, without charge therefor, from time to time, such motor vehicles, aeroplanes, and parts thereof, and machinery and tools to repair and maintain the same, as may be suitable for use in the Postal Service; and the Postmaster General is authorized to use the same in the transportation of the mails and to pay the necessary expenses thereof, including the replacement, maintenance, exchange, and repair of such equipment, out of any appropriation available for the service in which such vehicles or aeroplanes are used.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, after line 2, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 5. That section 3936, Revised Statutes of the United States, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3936. The Postmaster General may regulate the period during which undelivered letters shall remain in any post office and when they shall be returned to the dead-letter office; and he may make regulations for their return from the dead-letter office to the writers when they can not be delivered to the parties addressed: Provided, That when letters are returned from the dead-letter office to the writers, a fee of 3 cents shall be collected at the time of delivery, under such rules and regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 14, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 6. That the rate of postage on all mail matter of the first class deposited in any post office for delivery within the delivery district of such post office shall be 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. I make the point of order against the amendment that it is new legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the point of order that it is general legislation?

Mr. GRONNA. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, in regard to that amendment, I desire to say that the matter was recommended by the Post Office Department, and the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads went very fully into it. We think it is a very important provision in the interest of economy and involves legislation of which the people ought to receive the benefit. My understanding is that where legislation is recommended by a department and has been passed on by a committee the point of order does not lie.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But the point of order does lie in such a case if the amendment involves general legislation.

Mr. DIAL. Then, Mr. President, I believe the only recourse is to ask the Senate to pass upon the question as to whether or not it will sustain the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. DIAL. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? [Putting the question.] The "ayes" seem to have it. The "ayes" have it, and the decision of the Chair stands as the judgment of the Senate.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 27, after line 18, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 7. That the Postmaster General, under such regulations as he may prescribe for the collection of such postage, is hereby authorized to accept for delivery and deliver, without postage stamps affixed thereto, mail matter of the first class on which the postage has been fully prepaid at the rate provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 28, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 8. That the Postmaster General, when public convenience requires it, may, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe, establish within any post-office delivery one or more stations or substations for the receipt and delivery of mail matter and for the sale of stamps and other stamped paper: Provided, That the Postmaster General may also establish branch post offices or stations beyond the corporate limits or boundaries of any city or town in which the principal office to which such branch office or station is attached, without regard to the distance from the boundary line or the population of the village, town, or city in which such branch offices or stations are located.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I think the point of order would lie against this section, but I move to strike out the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not necessary for the Senator to make such a motion, as the question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] was called from the Chamber a few moments ago. Before leaving he advised me that he should very much like to have this amendment go over until he could be present, in order that he might be heard upon it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. HENDERSON. Was not the request of the Senator from Mississippi inspired by the fact that he desired the whole section to go out?

Mr. SMOOT. I am aware that the Senator from Mississippi is opposed to the amendment; but what he requested me to state was that he should like very much to have the matter go over, and I was going to ask the Senator from Michigan, having the bill in charge, if he would allow it to go over until the Senator from Mississippi returns?

Mr. TOWNSEND. As I understand, the Senator from Mississippi is in favor of the section going out. I was favorable to the proposition when it was submitted to the committee by the Postmaster General. I confess very frankly, however, that I did not thoroughly understand, nor do I think that members of the committee thoroughly understood, the possibility that lay in the particular amendment. We were considering simply the question of expedition and economy; we believed that we might economize by the adoption of the amendment; but we did not understand that it was going to make it possible to affect many postmasters and to change the whole orderly procedure as it now is. I did not understand that it had been considered several times previously.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. HENDERSON. Does this not involve the post-office accounting? The Post Office Department officials explained to us when we had the section under consideration in committee that it simply had to do with the accounting in the department, and the proposed change would expedite that branch of the service, but now we find that it might be extended to a broader and wider field.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We also know that there is practically one accounting office in every State, so that the accounting would not be more condensed than it is at present.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee what change is proposed by the committee amendment in the existing law?

Mr. TOWNSEND. From the proviso on is new legislation. Under existing law the Postmaster General may consolidate the offices within a radius of 5 miles providing there is a population of not less than 1,500 in the town which is to be made an adjunct of the main office. This proposes to extend the power of consolidation. The whole State, or two States, or the whole United States may be consolidated into one main office with stations at all other points. I do not think that would be done; but it shows the possibility under the amendment, which we did not consider when we passed upon it.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Then, as I understand the Senator, he desires simply to strike out the proviso, and in substance——

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; to strike out the whole of section 8, because that would leave the law just as it is.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, this is a clear change of existing law; it has been heretofore considered by the committee, I think, and the committee has declined to recommend it. I make the point of order against it that it proposes on an appropriation bill to change existing law and that it is general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 28, after line 12, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 9. (a) That a commission is hereby created to be composed of the chairman and four members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate, appointed by the President of the Senate, the chairman and four members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker of the House, and a postal expert appointed by the Postmaster General. Such commission shall, by majority vote, appoint seven persons who are experienced in business or commercial transactions, or represent business or commercial organizations which make extensive use of the Postal Service, to act as an advisory council and to aid such commission in its work. Vacancies occurring in the commission or in such advisory council shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointments. No member of such advisory council shall receive any compensation for his services. The commission may employ and fix the compensation of such engineers, special experts, clerks, and other employees as it may deem necessary: Provided, That each executive department and independent establishment of the Government is hereby directed to furnish to the commission such engineers, special experts, clerks, and other employees as the commission may require, whenever, in the opinion of the head of such department or independent establishment, the public business thereof will not be materially affected thereby.

(b) The expenses of the commission and of the advisory council, including all necessary traveling expenses incurred by a member of the commission, a member of the advisory council, an engineer, special expert, clerk, or employee, under orders of the commission, in making any investigation or upon official business in other places than the place of his residence, shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor, approved by the chairman of the commission, which approval shall be conclusive upon the accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

(c) The commission shall investigate (1) the present method of transporting mails and the facilities for distribution and delivery of mails in railway terminals, transfer offices, and railway postal cars; (2) the present system for transporting and distributing mails in the large cities in the United States and for dispatching mails leaving such cities; (3) the advisability of establishing a system of tunnels or pneumatic tubes in certain districts to facilitate the delivery of the mails therein; and (4) the advisability of establishing an aeroplane mail service and the future possibilities in regard thereto.

On or before March 1, 1921, the commission shall make a report to Congress containing a summary of its findings and such recommendations for legislation as it may believe to be proper.

(d) For the purposes of this section, the commission, or its duly authorized agent, shall have power to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence, and to administer oaths.

(e) The executive departments and independent establishments of the Government, when directed by the President, shall furnish the commission, on its request, all records, papers, and information in their possession relating to any subject of investigation by the commission.

(f) The sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available immediately and until July 1, 1920; and the unexpended balance on June 30, 1920, of any appropriation for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to be available after June 30, 1920, for the purposes of this section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, section 3, I believe, was passed over. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to that section. Clearly, in my judgment, both section 3 and section 9 propose new legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will not the Senator wait until the amendment which has just been read has been disposed of? The Chair understands that the amendment referred to by the Senator from Tennessee has been passed over, as other amendments have been passed over, to be taken up after the conclusion of the reading of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well; I will wait. But I thought that the other amendments had been completed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I suggest that both section 3 and section 9 go over.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will suggest to the Chair that section 3 was passed over, at my request, to be considered in connection with section 9, the amendment which has just been read. As I understand, the Senator from Tennessee desires to make a point of order against both those provisions?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Especially against section 9?

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to make a point of order against both of them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of course, if section 9 should go out, I should not be so insistent in regard to section 3. I think they ought to stand together.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think they ought.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But I do not think that section 9 is subject to the point of order which the Senator desires to make. This very question was brought before the Senate, I think, in 1917, in connection with the pneumatic-tube service. Vice President Marshall at that time ruled that it was not general legislation, but that it simply provided for the gathering of information for the necessary legislation of Congress. I thought it was a good ruling. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], as I recall, made the point of order and was overruled by the Chair. An appeal was taken and the Chair sustained. Therefore, I do not think that the point of order as to section 9 is well taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator from Tennessee make the point of order against section 9? The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. McKELLAR. I make the point of order against both sections.

Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a precedent involving a point of order that seems to have been made by the present occupant of the Chair on a former occasion in connection with a somewhat similar matter. I read from Gilfry's Precedents as follows:

[Fifty-ninth Congress, second session; Journal, pp. 226–227.]

On the question to agree to the following reported amendment, viz, to strike out all of lines 17 to 23, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"On and after July 1, 1907, all restrictions upon the alienation, leasing, or encumbering of the lands, except homesteads, of all allottees of Indian blood in the Indian Territory, and all restrictions upon the alienation, leasing, or encumbering of all the lands of allottees not of Indian blood, are hereby removed."

Mr. CURTIS raised a question of order, viz, that the reported amendment proposed general legislation to a general appropriation bill and that it changed existing law, and was therefore not in order.

The Vice President [Mr. Fairbanks] submitted the question of order for the decision of the Senate, and stated the question to be, Is the amendment in order?—yeas 22, nays 31. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 2340–2300, 2414.)

So it appears that the point of order then made by the present occupant of the chair was sustained.

There is a similar precedent in the case of a commission proposed to be created, to which I will refer in just a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Chair is ready to rule, I will submit the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The authority cited by the Senator from Tennessee is not applicable, because that applied to an amendment in an appropriation bill repealing a general law, and was in itself general legislation. This matter was held in 1917 by the Vice President, after two days' discussion, not to be general legislation. From that decision the Senator from Washington appealed, and the decision of the Chair was sustained by the Senate by a vote of 53 to 14. Therefore, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee appeals from the ruling of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it, and the ruling of the Chair is sustained.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Glass	Kirby	Sheppard
Chamberlain	Gore	McKellar	Smoot
Colt	Gronna	McNary	Spencer
Culberson	Harris	Moses	Sterling
Curtis	Henderson	Overman	Swanson
Dial	Jones, Wash.	Page	Townsend
Dillingham	Kendrick	Phelan	Underwood
Gay	Keyes	Pomerene	Warren

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to announce the absence of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] on account of death in his family.

Mr. GAY. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], is necessarily detained from the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I think it is well understood by the Senator from Tennessee, as it is by all of us, that if Senators are going to insist upon a quorum being present one can not be obtained this afternoon. I am very sorry that this has occurred, because we have this bill practically finished. We have this one item, besides the airplane item, upon which there will be no trouble, and yet we have to put over all of this matter until Monday, now, because of the disposition of the Senator to demand a quorum.

Mr. McKELLAR. Quite the contrary, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I say, it is quite the contrary. This is a matter that has engaged the attention of this body and the other body ever since I have been a Member of either of them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah will state it.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the rule of the Senate nothing can be done and nothing stated until we develop the presence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nothing except a motion to adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 29, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 27, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, help us to determine conscientiously the course to be followed in a given case. Then give us the forward look, the steady step toward the purpose in view. Let us be sure we are right and then go ahead. To look back is discouraging. To turn back is often fatal. Many a battle has been lost through hesitation. Make us strong, pure, noble.

The past is gone. The present alone is ours. Give us brave hearts to meet the future without fear or hesitation; for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4082. An act to amend section 4878 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 3, 1897.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3472) for the relief of the New Jersey Shipbuilding & Dredging Co., of Bayonne, N. J.

The message also announced that the President pro tempore had appointed Mr. GAY as a manager on the part of the Senate at the conference on the bill (H. R. 7656) to repeal the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof, and to provide for the disposition of all property acquired under and by virtue of the same, in place of Mr. TRAMMELL, excused.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 4082. An act to amend section 4878 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the act of March 3, 1897; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 3472. An act for the relief of the New Jersey Shipbuilding & Dredging Co., of Bayonne, N. J.; and

S. 2085. An act relating to the maintenance of actions for death on the high seas and other navigable waters.

RANK TO ARMY NURSES.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to strike from the calendar the bill (H. R. 2492) to grant rank to the Army Nurse Corps, and for other purposes. It is on the Calendar of Motions to Discharge Committees. The provisions of this bill are included in the Army reorganization bill, H. R. 12775, and I ask that the bill be stricken from the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to strike from the calendar the bill which he refers to.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, what is the bill about, and why should it be stricken from the calendar?

Mr. RAKER. It is a bill giving rank to Army nurses, and its provisions have been incorporated in the Army reorganization bill which has already passed the House. I simply want to clear the record.

Mr. WALSH. It does not do any harm on the calendar, and I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

INVESTIGATION OF THE FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois presents a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 502.

Resolved, That the Committee on Education, pursuant to authority of H. Res. 495, to investigate the Federal Board for Vocational Education, is hereby authorized to employ clerical and other assistance, and to incur necessary incidental expenses, which shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers countersigned by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Accounts.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 4, strike out the words "and other"; line 5, after the word "expenses," insert "not to exceed the amount of $2,500," so that as amended the resolution will read:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Education, pursuant to authority of House resolution 495, to investigate the Federal Board for Vocational Education, is hereby authorized to employ clerical assistance, and to incur necessary incidental expenses, not to exceed the amount of $2,500, which shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers countersigned by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Accounts."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. In a moment. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I simply wish to make this preliminary statement, that this is the necessary resolution based on the former resolution, H. Res. 495, passed a few days ago, authorizing the Committee on Education to proceed with the investigation of the Board for Vocational Education. The amendments adopted by the committee are solely to eliminate any other expense except that for clerical assistance, and also to limit the amount at present obtainable from the contingent fund to $2,500. I feel in my own mind, and the chairman of the Committee on Education has so assured our committee, that this amount will be ample, and that there will be no further demand made upon the contingent fund for this investigation. I am hopeful that it will not even approach this amount.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman give me 10 minutes as a member of the committee? I will appreciate it if he will. I may not use half of that time, but I should like to have it.

Mr. IRELAND. I will yield to the chairman of the committee first, if he desires time.

Mr. FESS. Only two or three minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Perhaps the chairman of the Committee on Education will prefer to use his time after I have spoken, because he may want to answer what I say, and I suggest that if he is willing, the gentleman yield first to me.

Mr. FESS. That will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield me 10 minutes?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, as a member of the Committee on Education, I want to protest against the passage of this resolution in this form. I believe it to be absolutely unnecessary. I am heartily in favor of this investigation. I have been in favor of it all the time. The record of the committee and the RECORD here will show that. I hope for a complete, rigid, careful investigation. We have everything in the world that the committee needs for that investigation except one thing, and that is, when the witnesses come here from New York, many of whom are poor ex-soldiers, many of them cripples, not able financially to pay their way here, the only thing on earth we need is for the chairman of the Committee on Accounts to authorize the payment of their expenses when they come here, the payments to be made upon vouchers to be issued by the chairman of our committee. And this can be done without passing the present resolution.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Just for a moment.

Mr. IRELAND. That has already been provided for.

Mr. BLANTON. If that has already been provided for, as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, it is everything on God's green earth that we need for this investigation. We do not need anything else. Why do we need $2,500 extra for clerical expenses? What has the clerical help to do in connection with this investigation? The distinguished chairman of our committee is one of the reputed economists of the House. If he needs any further clerical help than the clerical help we have right now, I want him to tell us what the clerical help is to do? Why, we meet there for this hearing. We are seated around the table. The clerk of that committee in 15 minutes can mail to every member of the committee a postal card telling him when the meetings are to be held, if he does not know it otherwise. We ought to know it otherwise; but if we do not he can put us on notice. What does the clerical help have to do in a hearing of this kind? Nothing. We meet and sit around the table. Witnesses are sworn by the chairman, or not sworn, according to the will of the committee. They give their evidence. We are furnished with the services of several expert stenographic reporters, now already drawing $6,000 per annum from the Government, to take down the evidence. Why, if we made any attempt to use any clerical assistance other than the committee clerk and stenographic reporters already on the pay roll now, they would be in the way, as they would have no duties to perform.

Mr. IRELAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. IRELAND. That is entirely in the hands of your committee. You do not have to spend a tenth part of this money that is appropriated simply because your expenses are limited to an exact amount.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not want even the temptation to spend money to be placed in the hands of the committee with reference to spending this $2,500 for additional clerical force, when I know it to be unnecessary. It is just $2,500 for this, and that, and the other committee, for this, that, and the other thing, and, after all, when you sit down and figure it up it runs into the enormous sum of millions annually, which brings us to facing a defict now of $3,000,000,000, which we have got to meet by additional taxation of the people of this country. The time is coming when we have got to stop it. I hope the distinguished chairman of the commitee will not permit this resolution to pass.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. I will state, Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the gentleman from Texas, that the chairman of the Committee on Education was before our committee and stated that he did not expect to employ any clerical assistance whatever unless, perchance, some particular work was necessary which his force could not do, and he does not expect any of the money to be expended in that direction. He further stated that he received telegrams, and he produced telegrams substantiating——

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not take up any further time in those statements; I have only 10 minutes. The distinguished chairman of this committee has a secretary furnished by Congress, whose salary is paid by the people. He has a clerk furnished by Congress, whose salary is paid by the people of this country. In addition to that, he has a clerk for the committee paid $2,500 by the people of this country. What is there to be done in connection with this investigation that that clerk of the committee can not do? What emergency could arise? Will the chairman say that he is going to get a lot of letters which require answers? The letters will not require to be answered. They can be read. They are propaganda, the most of them—some are in favor of and some against the hearing—but they are not going to control the committee in its efforts on this hearing. The letters can be read, but they do not have to be answered. It is not necessary to answer them. I get a lot of letters; I read them; and many I place in the wastebasket. Many I do not answer, for I know they are propaganda. I read them, and get the benefit of them, but I do not take the time of my clerical force to answer them. They are too busy with more important work. Many of such letters do not deserve an answer.

Is it not time for us to put into this House a policy, so often expressed by the majority leader, that we are going to begin to economize? When are we going to begin? We have not begun yet. We have got to begin some time. The deficit is growing larger every day. People are expecting us to do it. I want to tell you one thing—go home and talk with your business men, talk with your farmers, talk with your laborers, and you will find that the biggest question before the American people to-day is the question of retrenchment and sane economy. You have got to begin it, and now is the time. Let us cut off this $2,500 that we do not need and we do not want. We can have the hearing without it. I am one member of the committee who will help the distinguished chairman to have a proper hearing and investigation without the expenditure of this $2,500. If our committee gets overwhelmed with propaganda letters, I will agree to have my clerical force answer half of them under the dictation of the chairman, and my clerical force works as hard and has as much to do as any in the Capitol. [Applause.]

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the resolution passed recently giving authority to the committee to summon witnesses and swear them and sit during the sessions of the House for this investigation, the chairman sent wires requesting many persons whose names had been handed to him by Mr. Littledale to appear for the investigation. Among these names were those of several soldiers. The soldiers' testimony will be the most important, because it is upon their statement that the charges have been made.

I received wires from a great number, the telegrams of which I hold in my hand. Here are some extracts:

Does your committee pay necessary travel expenses of witness? I can not appear without transportation paid.

Another:

Received telegram asking me to testify voeational board Tuesday, March 30. I would be glad to testify, but will have to decline until my expenses are paid. In the meantime I will wait a subpœna.

Here is another:

Would gladly testify, but am without funds. Wire transportation. I know it can be done.

Here is another:

Can not appear on first Monday on account of shortage of funds; will wait reply.

Here is another:

Glad to come to Washington to testify on matter pertaining to the board, but can not do so at my own expense.

And so on in a number of telegrams. The chairman of the Education Committee was not authorized to forward transportation. The chairman spoke to the Committee on Accounts. The Committee on Accounts thought the proper way to proceed would be the regular resolution which has been presented this morning. The regular resolution was written in the usual form, using the term "clerical" instead of the language referring to subpœnas. I give it to the membership of the House upon my honor that there will be no clerical force in the way of assistant clerk hire, or anything of that sort, or in the employment of any attorney or counsel, or anything of that sort. It will be limited simply to the amount of the expense necessary to bring these people here to testify.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Am I wrong in my understanding that any committee of the House which is authorized to make an investigation may pay traveling expenses on the certificate of the Sergeant at Arms from the contingent fund of the House?

Mr. FESS. I understand that the Sergeant at Arms would not be free to issue any such certificate unless the Committee on Accounts recognized the account, and, more than that, I could afford to bring these men here if they were men who would pay their way, but to bring a crippled soldier down here without money by a subpœna, and then be unable to pay him while here, unless I paid him out of my own pocket, would be something I would not want to do. I would not want to be put into such a position as that; it would not be dignified.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understand that fully, but I thought the gentleman could pay these expenses in the manner stated.

Mr. FESS. I think not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the gentleman certain about that?

Mr. FESS. I am certain to the extent that I was advised not to do that.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The chairman of the Committee on Accounts [Mr. IRELAND] has just stated, in reply to my question, that he has already authorized the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] to issue these vouchers, and that the vouchers be paid.

Mr. IRELAND. Out of this appropriation. Arrangements have been made to forward transportation to these respective witnesses out of this appropriation, if it is agreed to by the House.

Mr. BLANTON. But the original resolution authorized this investigation, and concerning its expense the rules of the House authorizes the payment in connection with the authorization of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, and the chairman without this resolution would be authorized to issue vouchers for that.

Mr. IRELAND. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. FESS. The chairman of the committee has made this authorization upon the ground that this resolution will pass, because this investigation begins on Monday at 10 o'clock and we can not wait a later day than to-day.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GARD. How many witnesses has the gentleman who are unable to appear for the hearing on Monday?

Mr. FESS. There are 15 or 16 here in this bunch of telegrams.

Mr. GARD. Am I correct in my understanding of what the chairman of the Committee on Accounts said a moment ago, in that the expense of these witnesses had already been provided for by means outside of this proposed resolution?

Mr. IRELAND. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken in that.

Mr. FESS. No; but upon the belief that the House will pass this resolution the chairman of the Committee on Accounts made the authorization.

Mr. GARD. That is what I want to be clear about. I think everyone wants to grant the committee every authority to bring witnesses here, but I understood that the matter had been provided for in some other way. It is a part of this resolution?

Mr. FESS. It is a part of this resolution.

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the gentleman's contention that under this resolution the Committee on Education can issue subpœnas for witnesses to pay them other than the legal fee and the amount allowed for traveling expenses?

Mr. FESS. No; the gentleman does not contend that. He expects that they will be paid only the transportation and legal fee.

Mr. WALSH. Is it intended to pay the actual transportation or the legal fee for traveling?

Mr. FESS. It must be the legal fee for traveling.

Mr. WALSH. That is what is intended?

Mr. FESS. We want to be strictly within the law.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman accept an amendment limiting it to that?

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH], a member of the committee.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, there is no man in this House who is more in favor of actual economy than am I, and as a member of the Committee on Accounts, which favorably reported this resolution, I want to say that it is our purpose at all times to see to it that every dollar is saved the country that can be reasonably and judicially saved. This resolution has to do with the examination or the hearings that will be had investigating the Board for Vocational Training. It touches the interest and welfare of the men who have been crippled in the service. The chairman of the Committee on Education presented to us a number of telegrams in reply to requests that he had sent out to various witnesses throughout the country, and I believe that with but one exception they all demanded that their transportation be arranged before they leave to come here to testify. In order to make this investigation what it should be, in order that it may be a real investigation, and that we might go into it and see what the crippled soldiers of the country need, and are not getting, the Committee on Accounts feels that the House would cheerfully and willingly grant the usual and customary traveling expenses in order that these men may be brought here. It is stated by the chairman of the committee that no money will be expended for clerical help, although that authorization is in the resolution, unless, perchance, it was absolutely necessary to have some particular work done in some particular branch that could not be done by the regular clerk of the committee. In other words, the Committee on Accounts wants this investigation to be fair. We want the crippled boy, wherever he is, no matter in what part of the country he may be, who is not receiving fair treatment, if there are such, to have an opportunity to come here and appear before the committee and tell the committee wherein he is not receiving justice.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARRISH. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. What was this enormous sum of $2,000 that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] was speaking about to be expended for?

Mr. PARRISH. The amount to be paid to witnesses is not to exceed $2,500.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Is the amount to be paid to any particular witness limited to the expenses of the trip?

Mr. PARRISH. To any and all witnesses who are brought here at the request of the committee.

Mr. JONES of Texas. He is not to be paid more than the expense of his trip?

Mr. PARRISH. Not more than the legal allowance. He is not to be paid any more than the legal traveling fee.

Mr. MILLER. Suppose the expense of the witness reaching Washington and his stay here and return to the place whence he came is more than the legal fee?

Mr. PARRISH. It is not contemplated that he will be paid more than the legal fee.

Mr. MILLER. But suppose his expenses are more than the legal fee. Who makes up the residue?

Mr. PARRISH. It is not contemplated that the House will pay more than the legal fee under this resolution.

Mr. MILLER. Then if there is more they will have to bear the expense themselves?

Mr. PARRISH. Yes. That is the situation, gentlemen, in regard to the resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARRISH. I will.

Mr. CONNALLY. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any requirement that before these witnesses will be summoned that the committee shall certify it is believed that they are necessary for the inquiry?

Mr. PARRISH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] to answer the question.

Mr. FESS. The committee had submitted to it a list of names and the committee authorized the chairman to subpœna all of them.

Mr. CONNALLY. What I had in mind was that unless it is believed by the committee from some preliminary investigation that witnesses' testimony would be material and helpful to the committee I do not see any reason why you should summon men from across the United States to be brought here unless the committee has reason to believe that their testimony is material.

Mr. FESS. They will not be brought unless there is reason.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am sure the committee will use proper discretion.

Mr. FESS. The parties thus far submitted are in New York, one up near Boston, and one in Indianapolis, and none farther than that.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will state in that connection that distance alone would not influence me if witnesses were necessary to throw light on the matter under inquiry, but I do not think it would be wise to summon a great mass of witnesses here who are not material to the investigation.

Mr. FESS. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the chairman of the Committee on Education have some idea as to what the various witnesses will testify to—for instance, the one in New York or the one in Indianapolis? Has the chairman investigated sufficiently to know that this testimony would be pertinent to the purposes of the investigation?

Mr. FESS. Yes; the chairman of the committee is satisfied, and I think the whole committee is satisfied. Charges were made and immediately following the charge a request was made for having witnesses subpœnaed.

Mr. HASTINGS. I was just wondering whether the chairman was satisfied that those were material witnesses to the matter in issue.

Mr. FESS. The chairman is satisfied.

Mr. PARRISH. I think the Committee on Education will handle it properly. That is all I care to say on the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me to offer this amendment?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment. In line 3, after the word "to," strike out the following: "employ clerical and other assistance and to," so that the resolution will read as it will read with that left out.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLANTON: Line 3, after the word "to," strike out the words "employ clerical assistance and to."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. May I ask to have it reported as it would read?

The Clerk read as follows:

So as amended the resolution will read: "Resolved, That the Committee on Education, pursuant to authority of H. Res. 495, to investigate the Federal Board for Vocational Education, is hereby authorized to incur necessary incidental expenses, which shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers signed by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Accounts."

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I am fearful that this amendment might prove an embarrassment to the committee and I should not like to see it handicapped in any way in this investigation. It is barely possible that they might want an auditor or an experienced accountant to go over the books of this board, and if that case should obtain, I would like to see the committee make such employment, and I question further whether the resolution including the amendment would not allow them to employ any clerical help that they cared to have. It provides "for all incidental expenses," so that I think the gentleman's amendment is negligible, anyway, but I hope it will be defeated.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I was going to ask my colleague whether the authority to incur incidental expenses to the amount of $25 to $100 would not include assistance and everything?

Mr. BLANTON. Then the other is surplus.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is wider than it is now.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 1, noes 97.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Clearly there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 3, nays 278, not voting 146, as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 487.

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, compensation at the rate of $1,800 per annum for the services of a chief clerk in the office of the superintendent of the folding room of the House, such office to be in lieu of a messenger at the rate of $1,200 per annum.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this resolution contemplates the reviving of the office of chief clerk in the folding room and the abolishment, temporarily at least, of the office of messenger. Up until the Sixty-first Congress there were five employees in the office of the folding room. This number was reduced to four at that time and has so remained since. The business of the folding room has so increased and the congestion is so severe there that some relief must be given to it. The occasion for this resolution, which simply contemplates the revival of the office of chief clerk there, is necessary to hold a certain man that they have in their employ. At the time of the beginning of the Sixty-sixth Congress the employees of this folding room knew nothing about their duties, inasmuch as they were all green men, and the only man of any bookkeeping experience, who was an accountant as well, happened to draw the messenger's position at $1,200 a year. He is acting as chief clerk, drawing $1,200, while his subordinates are all drawing $1,600 each. So this resolution, if favorably acted upon by the House, increases our expenses only $600, the difference between $1,200 and $1,800, and places the man who is now drawing the lesser salary in the office of chief clerk.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. In just a moment. He is the only man competent, and has taught the others the bookkeeping of the department, and without reliance on him the congestion would have been so severe that the service to Members would have severely suffered.

Mr. BLANTON. Besides the superintendent, how many employees did the gentleman say there were in the folding room?

Mr. IRELAND. Only four in this department.

Mr. BLANTON. Besides the superintendent?

Mr. IRELAND. There is no superintendent in the folding room.

Mr. BLANTON. There is a superintendent of the folding room.

Mr. IRELAND. In the document room.

Mr. BLANTON. Is there not more clerical help in there than that?

Mr. IRELAND. I am informed by the Doorkeeper that there are only four in the cage.

Mr. BLANTON. But they are merely the executive employees in that department, are they not? Are there not other employees who actually do the folding and the clerical work in there? How many of such employees are there?

Mr. IRELAND. I presume so; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. About how many of them are there?

Mr. IRELAND. I can not give the gentleman the exact number.

Mr. BLANTON. There is quite a number of them?

Mr. IRELAND. I presume so. I do not know the exact number.

Mr. BLANTON. There are a number of them who do the folding in that folding room and clerical work.

Mr. IRELAND. That is in the document room.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman is referring to the actual folding room, where the speeches of Members, including the speeches of the gentleman from Texas, are put in envelopes furnished by the Government at Government expense and the work done at Government expense. I am not indulging in that at present myself, owing to a streak of economy.

Mr. BLANTON. I am indulging in it right now.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No doubt.

Mr. BLANTON. I want the people of this country to know something about their own business that goes on here in Washington, and to do so have paid the Public Printer about $2,000 to reprint certain speeches I have sent to the people, and that is the reason I am asking about this matter. I am sure the gentleman would like to have the people of the United States know, too, when it is their own business. There are numerous such employees in what we call the folding room proper?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman believe that we should have any more than four executive officers in this cage?

Mr. IRELAND. This does not contemplate any increase in number.

Mr. BLANTON. We have gotten along without this proposed chief clerk during this Congress.

Mr. IRELAND. This is the only man who had any knowledge of the business when he went in there, and he is a man of family. He has been an experienced accountant and was so employed up to the time of the war.

Mr. BLANTON. In the Sixty-sixth Congress——

Mr. IRELAND. We can not retain him at the present salary, and it seems vital to the service—at least it is so represented by the Doorkeeper—that he be retained.

Mr. BLANTON. In the Sixty-sixth Congress, which convened on May 19, 1919, up to the present time we have not had any chief clerk in this department?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes, sir. We had this man, who held the office as messenger, acting as chief clerk.

Mr. BLANTON. But we did not have any chief clerk drawing $1,800, as proposed, and we did not have any such chief clerk in the Sixty-fifth Congress, and we did not have any such chief clerk in the Sixty-fourth Congress; and the Sixty-fifth Congress was the war Congress, when I presume every Member other than the gentleman from Illinois did send something home to his people; and we did get along in the Sixty-fifth Congress, the war Congress, without this chief clerk, did we not, and the Sixty-fifth Congress was known as the Congress which had to expend money during the emergency, and the Sixty-sixth Congress is known as the retrenchment economy Congress, is it not?

Mr. IRELAND. The gentleman has quite as intimate knowledge of that as I have, and he does not need to interrogate me on the subject.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. IRELAND. I yield.

Mr. JUUL. If the gentleman will permit, I will answer him.

Mr. BLANTON. Very well.

Mr. JUUL. If my friend will yield.

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. We also got along without the printing press and the telegraph and the telephone for a good many years, but we are getting along better with them now.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but I am not sure, after all, that the increasing expense of these operations here is beneficial to the people who pay the taxes.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, we have made mountains out of mole hills, and wasted more time than is represented by the money involved in this resolution, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13266, known as the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

GOVERNMENT MATERIAL STORED IN TRAINING CAMPS.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me long enough to permit a short letter to be brought to the attention of the House, referring to several hundred carloads of war material which, if not disposed of, will be destroyed by the natural elements?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman just wants to present the letter to the House, without argument?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to address the House for how long?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Just two minutes. It is from an employee out here at Camp Humphreys; a letter in which he makes no criticism, but calls attention to several hundred carloads of war material, and asks that the matter be brought to the attention of Congress.

Mr. WALSH. Why does he not bring it to the attention of the War Department?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I will ask, Mr. Speaker, when the letter is read, that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the letter be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE QUARTERMASTER,
Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va., March 16, 1920.

No.: ——.
From: Will R. Miller, 3050 P Street NW., Washington, D. C.
To: Hon. JIM MCCLINTIC, M. C., Washington, D. C.
Subject: Use of material now owned by the Government and stored in the various training camps.

As the various States are now making especial efforts to improve the condition of their roads, I beg to call to your attention some facts with which you may not be familiar.

During the war the Government purchased vast quantities of standard steel bridge material, which, I understand, was to be used in the construction of bridges for railroads and wagon roads in France and in the country taken from the Germans in their retreat, all the bridges of which they completely destroyed. The sudden collapse of the Central Powers made the use of this material unnecessary, and as a result we now have perhaps millions of tons of it stacked in the various Army camps in this country. There is enough in this one camp alone to put first-class bridges on all the important crossings of big streams in the State of Oklahoma.

This material, you understand, is given a thin coat of red lead in oil when it is sent out from the factory, just enough to preserve it until it is erected and given due protecting care. You also understand this is very heavy material, and has to be unloaded by a crane. In this camp—and I suppose in all the camps where it is stored—it is simply lifted from the car by a crane and swung out beside the track and left. It is not only generally exposed to the elements, but it is often without the proper foundation, so it is exposed to the minerals of the soil as well as to oxidation, and so is deteriorating so rapidly that unless used or taken up and given care very soon it will be worthless for the purpose for which it was made.

This, you understand, is all standard-width material, strong and heavy enough for railroad bridging, and would be ideal material for bridges on roads in these days when we are just beginning heavy trucking with loads so heavy they must be reduced to meet the conditions of our old bridges.

It seems to me that Congress might well look into this matter and make some arrangements to distribute this valuable material among the States, especially the new States of the West, where it is so badly needed, and unless this is done very soon, say, within a period of one or at most two years, the material will be ruined.

This is only one of a class of articles purchased for war purposes that is now going to rapid decay. In these various camps are thousands of portable buildings that would be of the very greatest of value to the pioneer settlers of the West, both as dwellings and as outhouses, and even in the East they would be of the greatest value to farmers in various uses. Buildings of almost any size and form can be made of them, and they can be easily taken apart and transported. I suppose there is nearly 1,000 carloads of these portable buildings in this camp alone, and without care and protection within two years they will scarcely be worth moving, but if taken now and cared for would last as long as good lumber properly cared for would last.

This camp is near Washington. The road all the way is about as good as the pavement on Pennsylvania Avenue. I have often made the trip from here to the Union Depot in Washington in 35 minutes. Suppose you get a committee of Congressmen and drive out here some afternoon and look the situation over, with a view to some action that will preserve this material in some way for the development o. our country. In these times of high prices it would serve as a great relief.

Sincerely, yours,
WILL R. MILLER.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the letter be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can refer it at any time. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, what has become of the letter?

The SPEAKER. It was read.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman made a motion.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I simply asked that the letter be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was not recognized for that purpose. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 13266) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13266, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13266) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] has 27 minutes of time in general debate remaining.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Clairman, I suggest that the gentleman use some of his time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for five minutes.

THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to talk about the bill at present being considered, but I do want to talk about a matter in which every Member of Congress, particularly every lawyer, is interested. I introduced a bill to-day which, on March 1, 1920, I did not know ever would be necessary to be introduced. The subject matter of the bill was brought to my attention by the fact that in the decision of the case of the United States of America, appellant, against the United States Steel Corporation et al., on appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of New Jersey, the decision was rendered in this case by less than a majority of the court. Four justices of the court rendered the majority opinion, seven only presiding, when three of the seven were against the decision. Two justices of the court were disqualified. I have looked into the law to a limited extent, because I did not understand why it was that, in an important case like this, qualified justices were not appointed to preside in the place of disqualified justices. To my amazement my investigation disclosed the fact that there is no provision in the Revised Statutes anywhere for the appointment of a judge to preside in place of a disqualified justice in any case before the Supreme Court of the United States.

The law says that the Supreme Court shall consist of a Chief Justice of the United States and eight Associate Justices, any six of whom shall constitute a quorum. There were only seven who presided in this case, two being disqualified, and, as stated, four men virtually destroyed an act of Congress which the Congress had considered and debated on for months and months, and I contend that such a situation as this constitutes an evil that ought to be corrected, whether the decision was right or wrong.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. Does the gentleman advocate having temporary justices of the Supreme Court?

Mr. BRAND. I am going to tell you what I advocate. In almost every State in the Union where a judge of the State supreme court is disqualified there is authority given to the governor to appoint some competent judge to take the place of the disqualified judge. There is no politics in this proposition and nothing to be gained politically by either side of this House. I therefore invite the careful thought and attention of every Member of the House to it, and particularly the attention of the lawyers in the House.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Could not that be cured in the law by providing that no law of Congress could be set aside by less than a three-fourths vote of the court?

Mr. BRAND. In answer to that question I think legislation should be enacted providing that no act of Congress shall be annulled or held to be unconstitutional unless it is done by the decision of a quorum of that body, or at least by a majority thereof, in the first case by a vote of six and the other by the concurrence of five members of the court. But that is neither here nor there, and the question submitted is not the object of my making this statement. I want to state that this bill provides that when there is a disqualification in the Supreme Court of the United States it shall be the duty of the President to name some judge of the circuit court of appeals to preside in that case. Otherwise, if you follow the reasoning to its ultimate conclusion, there may come a time when five members of the Supreme Court are disqualified, which would leave only four to try any case pending in that court. The situation would be utterly unremedial under existing law. From one end of the statutes to the other no one can find any provision of law which would enable such a case to be tried. The litigants would be perfectly helpless if members of that court were disqualified, by reason of interest or otherwise, so as to bring down the qualified members to less than six. The court could not function and would be powerless to act, if in any case four members should be disqualified. That is a situation that ought not to exist. While we have gone on for over a century without any serious difficulty, yet in my judgment in the face of the important cases now coming before this court, particularly such cases as this steel case and the income-tax case, this defect in the law ought to be remedied. [Applause].

Under its first bill, approved by Washington on the 24th day of September, 1789, it was provided that the Supreme Court of the United States should consist of a Chief Justice and five Associate Justices, any four of whom should be a quorum, and yet, though subsequent legislation increased its number of justices to nine, only six constitute a quorum.

In my judgment, no case of such importance as to reach the Supreme Court of the United States should be heard or decided by less than a full bench of nine qualified justices, and no case should be decided by any number of members of said court less than a majority of the full bench, and in no event should any act of Congress be held unconstitutional unless concurred in by at least five members, or a majority of said court. [Applause.] By unanimous consent of the House, I submit for publication in the RECORD a copy of the bill which I have introduced and to which I have referred:

A bill authorizing the President of the United States to appoint a judge, or judges, to preside in the Supreme Court of the United States when any member, or members, thereof are disqualified.

Be it enacted, etc., That when one or more of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States are disqualified from deciding any case, by interest or otherwise, the President of the United States is authorized, and it shall be his duty, to designate and appoint a judge, or judges, of the circuit court of appeals, pro hac vice, to preside in said case.

SEC. 2. That said circuit court judge, or judges, when thus appointed are hereby authorized and directed to hear, consider, decide, and otherwise participate in any such disqualified case with all the power and authority now possessed and exercised by the judges of the United States Supreme Court under the laws and Constitution of the United States.

SEC. 3. That when and as soon as it is determined that any judge, or judges, of the Supreme Court are disqualified to try any case pending on the dockets of said court it shall be the duty of the court forthwith to direct the clerk of said court to promptly notify the President of the United States of this fact.

SEC. 4. That when the appointment of a judge, or judges, by the President, under the provisions and terms of this bill, has been received by the clerk of the Supreme Court, it shall be filed in his office and entered on the minutes of said court, and a certified copy thereof, under the seal of the court, shall be transmitted by the clerk to the judge so designated and appointed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY].

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, St. Peter was receiving a group of new arrivals at the gate of heaven, in answer to his question as to what each of the group did for a living while on earth, the first man in line said, "On earth I was the representative of justice between man and man; I also defended the oppressed and the unfortunate; I was a lawyer." The second said, "I brought the new-born babe into the world; I cured the sick; when that was impossible I lightened the pains of the dying; I was a doctor." The third said, "I tried to have men lead good lives; in prosperity I advised them to practice self-restraint; in adversity I bade them hope; I was a clergyman." The fourth said, "I defended my country against her enemies within and without; on the field of battle I faced death bravely; I was a warrior." The fifth said, "I made my country's laws; I championed and voted for the greatest good to the greatest number; I was a Congressman." [Applause.] The sixth member of the group was slow to answer; she had a worn and tired look and a subdued manner, but she was encouraged to speak, for she was a woman, and then she said, "I was the teacher who introduced these five distinguished gentlemen to knowledge. I guided their childish footsteps up the height of learning in their early days, but when fame and wealth came to them they not only forgot me but they denied me a living wage. That accounts for my weariness, which you will please excuse, for I had grown so tired through the incessant demands of teaching, I had become so worn out trying to make both ends meet on my poor salary, and had been so depressed from the long struggle against discouragement over not being appreciated on earth that death was a relief when it came, and I am glad that at last I am here." [Applause.]

When one stops to think of it, the ordinary business and professional man has almost absolute faith in the American schools. If he thinks of investing $500 or $5,000 in a venture, he investigates not only the line in which his money is to be placed but the identical persons who will have charge of it are ascertained and studied. Not so when his dearest possession, his child, is to embark in the educational sea. To some teacher whom he has never met and probably never will meet, for the father who visits a school is a rarity, he cheerfully turns over his little son and daughter, confident that in some mysterious way to him the unknown teacher will adopt the proper means for developing them into the kind of boy and girl every worthy father wants his children to be. And time usually proves that the parent did the right thing, for what Americans are they owe the best that is in them chiefly to the faithful and efficient teachers in our schools. [Applause.]

Once it was believed that anyone could teach school, but that is not true in this year of 1920. A brief survey of the preparation needed to become a teacher in the elementary schools and a slight examination of the ability, ingenuity, and acquaintance one must have in the fields related to the learning process in order to be a good teacher have convinced me that if only the public once began to glimpse the size of the teacher's job every voter who had the country's welfare at heart would demand that the teachers get a "square deal" by being paid decent salaries. I doubt if, with all the versatility there is in this House, there are five men listening to my voice who could step into any of the schoolrooms that are in charge of the teachers whose salaries I am now discussing and could conduct a class of 30 or 40 children with any degree of success for even a day. If you have any doubt about the difficulties of the task, try it some time and you will be more than ready to grant all the teachers ask for in salaries.

But teaching so many hours a day is not the full extent of the teacher's duties. Continuous preparation for the next day mortgages the teacher's evenings, and when that is finished there is reading to be done in order to keep abreast of the progress that is being made throughout this country, and other countries, too, in the profession. Educational magazines, attending summer schools, traveling to broaden her mental outlook and repair her worn-out nerves; all these take money, and if the teacher is denied the means to do them the schools and children—your children and my children—suffer.

Somewhere I have read that one man in a hundred goes to college, about ten in a hundred reach high school, about 90 in 100 never go beyond the elementary schools.

We hear considerable now about the Americanization of adults, a most laudable and patriotic project. But how about the children, the American citizens of to-morrow, native born and naturalized, the best hope of our country's future? Will it be good judgment to lose sight of them? Can the country, if it is to endure, afford to do so? Apparently that is what is happening, for 145,000 teachers resigned last year and went into other lines, because their own profession, which they preferred and which was certainly their first choice, did not pay them enough to warrant their continuing any longer in it. I have even heard of a teacher who had among her pupils two defective boys about 17 years old, and when these boys left school they started at jobs that paid each of them more money than their former teacher received for her salary.

I am not going to talk about the high cost of living. The Members of this House know considerable of that problem, and we are all aware of what it costs to live to-day. Our individual experiences in Washington have shown us how far the salary of a Member of this body goes and have made us sympathetic with the struggles of others. But the high cost of living is not confined to Washington; it seems to be nation wide. We have it in Chicago, and our teachers have been driven by the high cost of living to petition for increases in their salaries, which were partly granted, and they should have received every last cent of the amounts they were asking, otherwise what inducement is there for any intelligent, self-respecting girl to remain a teacher or to become a teacher, when teaching practically means a life of poverty, and there are so many other positions she can enter where she will receive wages or salary that will enable her to live as an American young woman should. [Applause.]

And so here in the National Capital Congress should set the example by raising the salaries of the teachers of Washington. Teaching, above any other calling, requires freedom from worry, and there is no worry more nerve-racking than financial worry. I can testify to that.

Advocating this increase in salaries, as I do to-day, is simply consistent with my attitude of 1918, when I voted to increase the salaries of the Washington school-teachers. I believed then and believe now that both justice to the teachers and the welfare of the children of Washington require this action.

For the sake of the children of Washington let us increase their teachers' salaries, mindful of the fact that what gladdens the lot of the teacher is reflected in the smiling faces and brightened minds of her pupils, whose future spells weal or woe for these United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I will call the attention of the House to the fact that the District of Columbia is in a deplorable condition. Under the law passed in 1878 we can appropriate only double the amount of the revenues of the District for the current year for all improvements in the District of Columbia. That amount this year was a little over $9,000,000. Therefore your committee was limited to a little over $18,000,000 in the appropriations which they have recommended for the maintenance of the government of the District of Columbia. It has developed that the commissioners had to prune down their estimates for necessary and urgent improvements for the District of Columbia more than $6,000,000. That was necessary on account of what is called the half-and-half system. What was the necessary result? In many portions of this District schoolhouses could not be built where they were needed. We have authorized the construction of only six, where several more were needed. When I call attention to the fact that there are in each room in these schoolhouses from 35 to 60 students you will have some idea of the congestion. When I call attention to the fact that there are from 40 to 70 students for each teacher, you will have some idea of the crowded conditions and of the impossibility of giving proper instruction to the youth of our land.

It was said the other day by the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that school-teaching is a stepping-stone to other professions. I want it made so throughout this country that other professions will be stepping-stones to the profession of school-teaching. [Applause.] We must care for the youth of this land in order to guarantee the safety, the progress, and the greatness of our Nation in the future. So that whether you eliminate the half-and-half plan or not the taxes of the District of Columbia must be raised.

Otherwise, it is a hobble upon the progress of your city. It is a hobble upon the sanitation of your city. It is a hobble upon the charitable work of your city. It is a hobble upon the increasing of your water supply to meet the future needs of this growing city.

Do you realize that in the last few years this city has increased in population from 350,000 to 455,000? And that increase is continuing by leaps and bounds. In every direction it is extending, which demands the extension of the sewer systems, the streets, the park system, and the school system. Yet you confine this committee and this Congress to double the amount of the revenue realized from a system over 32 years old. Those who advocate that system are mossbacks and have not their eyes open to the progress and the changing conditions of the day. [Applause.] Why, sir, in this city there are intelligent men, intellectual men, who have been advocating the half-and-half system under the old law so long that their convictions have become hidebound and they can not see any other side to the question.

I do not think the abolition of the half-and-half system is going to reduce the expenditures from the Federal Treasury. That day is past. Abrogate your half-and-half plan and the Congress of the United States will make bigger appropriations for the needs of the District than they ever made before out of the Federal Treasury. But before we do it the citizens of the District must contribute their just share; must pay a tax commensurate with citizens of other cities similarly situated.

That is about all I want to say, and I hope no man will make a point of order against the provision increasing the tax rate from 1½ to 2½ per cent. Let me tell you something. The estimates for school buildings which we have authorized were made last October. Since that time the cost of material and labor have advanced in price, and it now develops that it will take 25 to 30 per cent more than we have recommended in order to construct the necessary school buildings. How are you going to do it? If you add that much to the appropriation, it will run over double the revenues of the District.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Right along that line I wish to say—and I am violating no confidence—that at half-past 11 this morning in my office were the two Commissioners of the District, Mr. Brownlow and Mr. Kutz. They showed me data that they had just received showing that the estimates they have put in for the erection of some of these school buildings would have to be increased 25 or 30 per cent. The estimates were made last October, and they told me this morning that they would have to be raised 30 or 33 per cent on all the buildings.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That would carry more than double the revenues of the District. We had hearings on this bill extensively. Many citizens of the District appeared before the committee and many of them were asked the question, after hearing the situation, "Are you willing for the taxes of this District to be raised?" With a few exceptions, these intelligent, patriotic men, men of property, with sympathy and enterprise in their hearts, stated, "We want our taxes raised and want our children and the city taken care of."

On the other hand, we found a few avaricious men who bow down only at the shrine of Mammon, who objected, and some said they were willing, provided we kept the half-and-half plan. From such men my mind turns with loathing and indignation.

Now, in every State in this Union the people of those States authorize the initiation of special taxes to provide for the education of the children. Not so in this District. Congress alone can raise the rate. Now, the citizens desire that the rate be raised. Are you going to prevent them from educating their children by having their taxes raised when they want them raised? As I say, there are a few misguided individuals who have their eyes closed to the best interest of the District. It is our duty to open their eyes and the purse. I hope that no Member will make the point of order to the provision increasing the rate of taxation in the District but let it go through. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia to the extent that they are sufficient therefor and the remainder out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full for the following expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, except amounts to pay the interest and sinking fund on the funded debt of said District, of which amounts one half is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, namely.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in lieu of the paragraph stricken out on the point of order the following:

"That the following sums are appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia to the extent that they are sufficient therefor and the remainder out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, but the amount to be paid from the Treasury of the United States shall in no event be as much as one half of said expenses, in full for the following expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, except the amounts to pay the interest and sinking fund on the funded debt of said District, of which amounts one half is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, namely."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment long enough to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if this is the same amendment that heretofore has been ruled in order.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The identical amendment put in last year and held in order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The rate of taxation on real estate in the District of Columbia, under the provisions of section 5 of the District of Columbia appropriation act approved July 1, 1902, is hereby increased from 1½ per cent to 2½ per cent, and the rate of taxation on tangible personal property in the District of Columbia, under the provisions of section 6 of the said act, is hereby increased from 1½ per cent to 2½ per cent.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I would like to ask the distinguished gentleman in charge of the bill how much consideration was given to this question in the committee?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. At various times for over six weeks.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. "At various times," did the committee sit down with somebody and have hearings on the subject?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No special hearings.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It acted on general information?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Information chiefly obtained from men who came before the committee who were asking for permanent improvements, for school buildings, for parks, and so forth. They were informed what the estimates were at the present time and what it would take to grant these requests, and the question was asked, How are we going to raise the money if the half-and-half principle prevailed? We have not the money. They immediately said, "Raise our taxes."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That was upon the statement that there would not be money enough on the half-and-half plan, which everybody knows is not so.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do not want to contradict the gentleman.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman knows that there is a surplus now belonging to the District in the United States Treasury of several million dollars, because it has not been used under the half-and-half arrangement.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I supposed that everybody knew it.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I know there is what is called a surplus in the Treasury of the United States, not used heretofore. That is called a surplus, but some of the best lawyers in the country, and I agree with them, say that legally that belongs to the miscellaneous fund in the Treasury of the United States, but I have said and still say that legally or not, morally and equitably it belongs to the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know who the "best lawyers in the country" are, but I would like to see the opinion of any reputable lawyer anywhere who asserts that the Government of the United States, having collected money from the District of Columbia in taxes, for use in the District of Columbia, has the right to put that money in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, as belonging to the General Government. I discount the authority of any such lawyer.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Has the gentleman read the taxing law of the District, the organic act of 1878?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, I read the taxing law of the District before the gentleman ever came to Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And I will say to the gentleman that it has been stated here frequently in the discussion of District matters that this money has been accumulated and carried in the Treasury as District of Columbia money. That has been a concession heretofore in the course of the debates that we have had in respect to District of Columbia matters.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No such concession, officially or otherwise, ever came from this committee.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] is misinformed. If dynamite should blow up the District Building to-night, and blow up these auditors' books, there is absolutely nothing in the nature of an account kept in the Treasurer's office that would show this fund, because the act of 1878 specifically provides how the taxes shall be collected and the assessment made, and the next clause is the specific clause that all of the money so collected shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to "Miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Notwithstanding which fact we have recently covered into the Treasury out of the District funds a number of different items, pursuant to different acts of Congress, specifically naming them, so as to transfer the money belonging to the District of Columbia from the money of the United States. It has taken a few fanciful minds in recent years to dig up this theory, which I do not think is entertained by any good lawyer on earth, except the good lawyers on the Committee on Appropriations. However, I reserve the point of order for the purpose of getting some information.

Mr. SISSON. I take this view, that as a moral obligation every dollar which the Federal Government has received on account of taxation in the District of Columbia is a fund morally, if not legally, which belongs to the District, and there is a moral obligation there which Congress will never repudiate and which it ought not to.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, it is a legal obligation.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Has it ever been so decided?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Nobody ever had the gall to question it until this Committee on Appropriations comes in and does it.

Mr. SISSON. No member of this subcommittee ever questioned it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But what has all this to do with the question before the committee?

Mr. SISSON. I think the gentleman from Illinois should read the act. On its face it does not deal differently with this tax than it does with any other tax collected and paid into the Federal Treasury, which is in a separate section of that law, and it seems that at that time there was no contemplation that any question should be raised about this money being paid to general receipts.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But they always kept it separate.

Mr. SISSON. Not in the Treasury.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, they always kept the account separate, and for years when the General Government advanced more money than its half it always recouped itself from money collected subsequently.

Mr. SISSON. If the statement made by the gentleman is true, then the Treasury officials and the auditor of the District of Columbia, who made the statement to us, do not know what they are talking about.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman is mistaken; that is LOT what they told the gentleman.

Mr. SISSON. But they did tell the gentleman that, and not only that——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And he told it to me also.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from Illinois knows nothing about this matter. I asked the auditor specifically about it and specifically about the bookkeeping, and his own expression was that if you destroyed the books kept by the auditor of the District that account would be most difficult to determine in the Treasury, as that was put into the Treasury to the account of miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. These accounts that were covered in from the District funds to the general fund in the Treasury were found upon an investigation of the Treasury books themselves, notwithstanding the gentleman says they do not keep any books up there. We took away a million dollars or two million dollars from the District of Columbia funds and gave them to the Treasury, because they found that amount on the books of the Treasury.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman will find that it has been a mere bookkeeping affair.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course it was a bookkeeping affair.

Mr. SISSON. An act of Congress would be necessary to make any change in the Treasury's books, and the only entry, the only audit, so the auditor of the District of Columbia said, was to make the change in a bookkeeping account on the auditor's books of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, the position now taken by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is that the Government of the United States not only has the right in the future but it has had, in fact, in the past the right to collect, and has collected, money from the people in the District of Columbia to be covered into the general fund of the Treasury and used for purposes anywhere in the United States. That is the position the gentlemen take.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think that morally they have that right.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If it is true as to the past, then it is true as to the future, and that must be the reason they propose now to raise the taxes in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SISSON. I am not complaining myself about the language of those peculiar statutes, but I was very much impressed a day or two ago in making a careful investigation of the statutes to find that this money went into the Federal Treasury as any other tax.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If I came to the conclusion the gentleman has, I will be much more surprised than he was.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has not investigated this matter and just does not know. I have always contended upon the floor and have always felt just as the gentleman from Illinois, that there was a separate account kept in the Treasury Department of the amount of money paid by the District of Columbia into the Treasury. When the auditor told me I was mistaken about it I then got the organic act to see whether or not they were complying with the statutes, and they were complying literally with the statutes. The money that is collected by the District is paid into the United States Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts, and I asked, "How do you determine the amount of money that is to be appropriated?" He said, "From my own books." Now, the clerk of the committee is here and understands the situation, I think, as well as any man in Congress, better than any man in Congress——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Better than any man on the committee, and that would include Congress.

Mr. SISSON. Very much more than I do. I admit that without him we would be frequently at a very great loss, because he is very skillful and a very learned clerk of this committee.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have dealt with him, and I will admit it now.

Mr. SISSON. He entertains the same view in reference to that matter that we do.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have frequently seen the committee change its view. When the committee changed its view——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will ask for five more minutes in order to get some more information.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman proceeds——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; I would like to get some information if I may before the time is up. What I want to learn is, and what the gentleman is talking about is not giving the information, how much consideration the Committee on Appropriations has given to this subject of the tax matter. Of course, I could write in 2 per cent or 2½ per cent if I desired, but what consideration did the Committee on Appropriations give to the question of the rate of taxation?

Mr. SISSON. If I can do so, I will tell the gentleman briefly how the whole matter came up. In the first place, for a number of years the subcommittee has communicated with authorities of other cities as to the rate of taxation and the rule of assessment and compared that from year to year with the rate of taxation and the rule of assessment here. At this time when the necessities confronted the committee we dealt with it as all legislative bodies deal with necessities of State or county organizations. There are certain essential and necessary expenses, a great deal of it due to the increased price of material and labor and the dire necessity in the future for an enlargement of the water system.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I take it from the gentleman's statement he has not started to answer the question I asked.

Mr. SISSON. I am getting to it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Did the committee give any consideration directly to this question except in a general way?

Mr. SISSON. It has just as specifically as can be given to any question where the proposition is, Where will you get the money to do essential things in any community? Now, the needs of the District of Columbia for the immediate future made it necessary that this amount of money shall be raised. Now, unless the rate of taxation should be unreasonable, the fairest way to determine it is to determine what the people themselves vote upon themselves.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. How much will this raise?

Mr. SISSON. This will raise about $5,000,000, the best estimate that can be made at this time, provided——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This increase of 1 per cent will raise how much money?

Mr. SISSON. About $5,000,000.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. How much does the 1½ per cent now raise?

Mr. SISSON. The revenue raised is about $9,000,000 in round numbers.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And 1 per cent more would be $5,000,000?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. To be exact $8,100,000 now.

Mr. SISSON. In round figures nine million six hundred and odd thousand dollars——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And 1 per cent would only raise $5,000,000?

Mr. SISSON. I said in round figures.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I wanted to get at how careful the gentleman was. The gentleman says 1½ per cent will raise over $9,000,000 and 1 per cent will raise $5,000,000. I do not understand his arithmetic——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If the gentleman will yield, the taxes we are talking about now, the amount next year, would be $8,100,000; that is, real and personal tax, but it is not all the income of the District.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. We get a revenue from other sources. There is a total revenue of $9,645,000.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This shows how carefully the committee considered the matter when two gentlemen on the committee state that the tax rate of 1½ per cent would yield $9,600,000——

Mr. SISSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I said revenues.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; I asked what the rate of 1½ per cent yielded, and that is what the gentleman said. Now, the other gentleman says $8,000,000. I do not think the committee has given very careful study to this subject, owing to the limit of time.

Mr. SISSON. I think the gentleman has done the committee a very great injustice.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I regret it, as I did not want to do it.

Mr. SISSON. Because I believe that every Member of the committee has worked very faithfully and did the very best we could with our judgment and mind to be fair both to the Congress and to the District, and no State could give more attention to a matter than we have to this.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand. I am not saying the committee did not give attention to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, in reference to the question raised here a while ago, certainly it is a fact that very often on this floor the argument made against the half-and-half plan has been that it has resulted in the accumulation of an unexpended balance in the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia.

I recall very well that one of the most prominent Members, when that matter was last year under consideration, said that, and he said if we did not abolish the half-and-half plan the time would come when the District would be demanding that the accumulation be spent for the benefit of the District. Now, a different and inconsistent position is taken by the members of the subcommittee.

Mr. Chairman, I own no property in the District of Columbia, and without any conference with Washington people who may be interested in this matter, and not at the request of any of them, I wish to take the liberty of very briefly stating the views that I entertain. The central proposition of the bill is the one now under discussion. It is a sudden and drastic proposition to greatly increase the tax rate on real and tangible personal property. As I understand, it is admitted by the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the bill that in a sense the increase is arbitrary. Further, it is explicitly admitted by him that the subcommittee made no investigation in the ordinary sense.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is absolutely contrary to the fact.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Here is what the gentleman said yesterday in answer to a question I propounded. I asked him how much investigation had been made, and he said this:

> When gentlemen of large means would come before our committee and ask to have these extraordinary improvements made, running into the millions, before we would get through we would put the question, "Where are we going to get the money to do it?" Invariably, with one exception, they replied, "Raise our taxes." That is the information I am talking about and that is what I am trying to do.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Did I state in that connection that is all the information we had? That is only a very small part of it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I was about to state that in addition you said that you acted a good deal on the basis of what had been ascertained in investigations, not by the subcommittee but back of the time to which the inquiries of the subcommittee were confined. So I think we are warranted, whatever the merits or demerits of the proposition, in saying it comes here without the sort of consideration that ordinarily is given and ought to be given such an important matter. Without reference to the essential qualities of the proposition and to what may be finally determined upon proper inquiry, it is unjust to the District of Columbia to take the action that is now proposed. This is, of course, a subject of importance, not only to the people of the District but it must be a subject of great importance in the estimation of the people of the country who, it may be assumed, are against making conditions here complex and uncertain and thus perhaps retard the growth and beautification of the Capital City and diminish its importance and progress.

Now, it is said that the proposition rests to a considerable extent on what large property owners have told the subcommittee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It is stated that the foundation of the report of the committee is based on the statements made by large property owners to the subcommittee.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is only a subsequent incident. As the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] said, for years, and even now, we investigated in order to ascertain what other cities of this size were paying, and we found this city was paying less than one-third of what most of them were paying. We have had that information. We have been accumulating it all the time for years, and finally, as a round-up, we asked these big men what we should do, in view of all this information, and they said, "Raise our taxes." That is the foundation of it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. There has been and is a great deal of controversy as to what the facts are when comparisons are made of localities with localities.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Not when I take my own city, and the city of Minneapolis and cities of that size, where they pay 43 mills, where here they pay only 15 mills. There is no guesswork about that. For instance, we take Kansas City the same way, and other cities of the same size.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Let that be conceded as to the cities mentioned, and yet we are obliged to recognize that there are those who claim that a comparison of Washington with other cities will lead to a different conclusion.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They can not produce any proof of that.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Speaking as a Member of the House who has not been here during the investigations heretofore made, I think that we are entitled, when a committee brings in an important matter like this—a basic recommendation—to have definite facts which will enable us to take action free from any element or claim of injustice or mistake. And that is all I care to say on that point, and I say it without criticism of the able members of the subcommittee, for whom I have very great respect. We ought not to use the District as a sort of political experiment farm.

It seems to me that instead of Congress tinkering with this subject of taxation in the manner we observe, it might be better for Congress, having created a government here, with a commission at its head, to leave to that government not only the matter of assessing property, as is now done, but the matter of fixing the tax rate, providing, if you please, that sufficient revenue shall be produced by local taxation to pay at least 50 per cent of the total expenditures, or, if the proportion should be higher, make it higher. Vest in the commissioners that power and trust to them to use it properly, and, knowing that if there is any abuse of the power there will be no difficulty in Congress quickly applying a correction.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Suppose, however, when you come to appropriate, the commissioners or the government of the District of Columbia have not provided the sufficient funds, what will you do with that situation?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. You might just as well assume that Congress would not provide its part of the total.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Is it not a human instinct, almost, that where there is some other place to secure your help that they will fail to act if by so doing they can save their own pocket?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I do not think so. I do not attribute any such degree of inefficiency or selfishness—to substitute another term for your word "instinct"—to those who control the affairs of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I wanted to ask the gentleman what the total assessment in the District is on real and personal property?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I think the law provides that the assessment shall be two-thirds of the cash value.

Mr. O'CONNOR. How much does that amount to on the dollar?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The figures were given here a moment ago as to real and personal property.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What is the rate?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The amount was $6,400,000 on real estate and $1,700,000 on personal property. That is the tangible property, not the intangible.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I take it that the gentleman will admit that it would not be safe to let the District Commissioners fix the tax rate unless there was a fixed ratio between the amount to be paid out of the District funds and the amount to be paid out of the General Treasury?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Certainly, there should be provided a minimum percentage.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If Congress should want to change the rate to a proportionate amount from fifty-fifty to some other ratio, and it should be changed, would it not be perfectly feasible to provide that the District Comissioners should fix the tax rate based upon the appropriation for the fiscal year made by Congress?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. There would be no difficulty, I think, in that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That would be a simple matter.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. A very simple matter.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is not that practically the way the tax rate is fixed everywhere?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes; everywhere, except in the District of Columbia. We make it an exception. I think we ought to quit doing that.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The distinguished chairman will bear me out in the statement that there appeared before the committee a gentleman in the District whose property was about to be condemned who showed by positive proof of witnesses here, who seemed to know that his property was worth not $5,000, at which it was given in, but that it was worth actually $15,000, and he had been assessing it at $5,000 and paying taxes at only 1½ per cent on two-thirds of $5,000. Is not that the case?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think that is true, but I do not want to say positively that it is true.

Mr. BLANTON. That was the statement.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Suppose it is true. I will undertake to show hundreds of cases decided by the courts, in which the same thing appeared, and I will undertake to say that I can find similar instances in the gentleman's district.

It is often found that the owners of the property in condemnation proceedings claim figures which greatly exceed the figures at which the property is assessed.

Another thing I want to take the liberty of saying is that I think what is occurring here now emphasizes the importance of the District of Columbia being represented by a Delegate in this House, capable of engaging in the discussions here and furnishing first-hand information. That would not require a constitutional amendment. It would not require the government of the District to be put upon the ordinary political basis. It would not require the exercise of the right of suffrage. There could be no valid objection, it seems to me, to taking care of the situation in that way at least for the time being. The Delegate might be appointed by the President, upon the recommendation of the commissioners, and with suggestions from the various civic bodies of the District.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I would like one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The District should have a spokesman here whose participation in the debates would be not only of advantage to the community he would represent, but would be of very decided advantage to Congress, all the Members of which I have no doubt are anxious to do the fair and the right thing with respect to the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, this matter does come up every year, and it is going to come up every year until you settle it correctly. This House repeatedly by overwhelming majorities has passed a law abolishing the so-called half-and-half plan. The bill was tied up between the Houses on one occasion, and the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, then a Member of the House, offered an amendment providing that a joint commission between the two Houses should be appointed to investigate the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government. That committee at the time it was appointed caused those of us who felt that we wanted an impartial report to entertain a sense of outrage, because when the Speaker appointed the three men all of them were found to be men who had voted for the half-and-half plan. In the Senate all of them had also voted for the half-and-half plan; and yet, after sitting here three or four months, that commission made a unanimous report recommending that the half-and-half plan be abolished.

We have been unable to get any action on that report, and from time to time, as we endeavor to do what we believe to be right, there are men that rise upon the floor without full knowledge of the facts and endeavor to postpone the date and the time of action. There is always something technically wrong with your committees of Congress. We can investigate matters and tax the billions of property in the United States outside of the District. No word of protest. But try to tax the District and up jumps some Member and finds fault. He holds up his holy hands in holy horror. We can sit here from year to year and make investigations of the facts and conditions and devote our time impartially and directly to the question, and yet there is criticism made of the reports that we make by the misguided or interested Members who do not want anything done but want the people at home to continue paying taxes for this District.

The human mind is always liable to error. There is but one Being that does not make error, and that is Deity itself. A man does not live who can show that with labor conditions such as they are in the District of Columbia—with labor from two to three times as high as it was before; with material for streets and buildings two or three times as much as it was before; with salaries of the school-teachers in the grades raised from $500 a year, as it was a few years ago, to $1,440; with over $300,000 added to the pay of the police department; with over $300,000 added to the firemen's salaries; with the city having grown from 365,000 in the last four years to over 455,000, as is now shown by the census; with numbers of streets everywhere having to be opened up and pavements to be made, school buildings to be erected—that all these things can be done without raising taxes here in the District.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. In addition to that, we have a water system intended to take care of a population, when it was first instituted, of something like 40,000 souls, including the employees of the Federal Government, back before the Civil War. Then, when this act went into effect in 1878, there was a total population in the District of Columbia of a little over 100,000 people. The District was overwhelmingly in debt. Its bonds had become due. The Federal Government had all the sovereignty in the District. The State of Maryland had ceded to the Congress of the United States the territory within the District, and Congress having sovereignty over every foot of it as the seat of government felt that the National Capital should be made a decent place to live in, and the Federal Government shouldered half of an indebtedness which it did not create.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] in making his statement loses sight of the fact that we have paid something like $20,000,000 of a debt that the Federal Government did not incur. In addition to that we have paid one-half of the interest at 3.65 on the bonds as that interest became due. In addition to that in every appropriation bill there are items carried which ought to be charged against the people of the District of Columbia, but Congress has not quibbled about them. We have gone along and made the improvements, and there are several million dollars included in bills other than this. Each year Congress is contributing to the improvements of the city. But now we find ourselves confronted with a condition and not a theory. The problem that is laid down by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] means that we shall pass this matter over. If you do, it will be against the protest of the men who represent fairly and faithfully the United States Treasury, and whose constituents as a whole have voluntarily had their taxes doubled, and in many States have had their school taxes quadrupled in order that their children might have the advantages of education; and those people who are submitting to this enormous taxation must contribute to the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia while the people in this District are taxed about one-third as much as the people in the cities of the States are taxed. Yes, at a rate that was fixed in 1878. Gentlemen of the House, it is not fair, it is not just, it is not right; and if the newspapers of this country should carry the cold-blooded facts to your constituents at home, instead of the misrepresentations of the Washington press in reference to our attitude, you would find that the people back home would not for one minute tolerate your voting the people's money away in this manner. [Applause.]

What have your committee done? In general debate we have presented to you the fact that property is assessed in the District of Columbia about like it is assessed in Illinois or Mississippi. Property is assessed at very much less than it is worth. I am going to be fair if I know how to be. When we put upon them an increase of 66⅔ per cent no man can look you straight in the eye and say that we have done the District of Columbia any injustice. There were members of the subcommittee who thought the rate ought to be increased more than that. Some of them said, "Yes; but the trouble is there will be a row made, and maybe we can get a less amount through." They knew what efforts would be made. They knew how active certain gentlemen would become.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. SISSON. I ask permission to proceed for five minutes longer, because this is an important item.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It will come up later, I am told.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I suggest that you discuss it on its merits.

Mr. SISSON. Certainly; I understand.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I make the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman said he would give me a little time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not think I do, it is so clear.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I ask the gentleman to reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Committee on the District of Columbia appropriation bill report the following item in the pending bill:

> The rate of taxation on real estate in the District of Columbia, under the provisions of section 5 of the District of Columbia appropriation act approved July 1, 1902, is hereby increased from 1½ per cent to 2½ per cent, and the rate of taxation on tangible personal property in the District of Columbia, under the provisions of section 6 of the said act, is hereby increased from 1½ per cent to 2½ per cent.

Of course, no one will contend that it is within the power of the committee to report legislation on an appropriation bill, and it is clear that this provision is legislation in that it seeks to amend the act of 1902. Furthermore, if the provision were offered as an amendment by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia under the proviso to the Holman rule it would hardly be in order, since a revenue amendment is not germane to an appropriation bill, nor is an amendment increasing income or revenue such retrenchment legislation as would be in order under the Holman rule.

Therefore the Chair, without expressing any opinion as to the merits of the case, feels that the point of order is well taken, and sustains it.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 13266), had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in the consideration of H. R. 13266, a bill "making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes," it shall be in order, the general rules of the House to the contrary notwithstanding, to consider all of the items under the caption "Public schools," in so far as they relate to the compensation of officers, teachers, and other employees, and in so far as they relate to the construction of school buildings.

Resolved further, That it shall be in order, the general rules of the House to the contrary notwithstanding, to consider the following paragraphs in the said bill or as amendments thereto:

"The rate of taxation on real estate in the District of Columbia, under the provisions of section 5 of the District of Columbia appropriation act approved July 1, 1902, is hereby increased from 1½ per cent to 2½ per cent, and the rate of taxation on tangible personal property in the District of Columbia, under the provisions of section 6 of the said act, is hereby increased from 1½ per cent to 2½ per cent.

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are directed to increase the scale of water rates in effect in the District of Columbia by not less than 25 per cent per annum for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921: Provided, That such increase shall remain in effect until otherwise provided by law.

"The rates of assessment for laying or constructing water mains and service sewers in the District of Columbia under the provisions of the act entitled 'An act authorizing the laying of water mains and service sewers in the District of Columbia, the levying of assessment therefor, and for other purposes,' approved April 22, 1904, are hereby increased from $1.25 to $2.50 and $1 to $2, respectively, per linear front foot for any water mains and service sewers hereafter constructed or laid."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the point of order having been made to the legislative proposition referred to the rule is made necessary to make legislation in order that would enable Congress to provide for an increase in the rate of taxation in the District of Columbia.

Under this rule, it will be in order to consider that question. Personally, I think the rate fixed in the bill is high, higher than is necessary to raise the amount of money that will be required to meet the share that the District should pay for the expenses that it is proposed to incur. But the House should have an opportunity to consider the matter in view of the fact that it is of pressing importance that teachers' salaries be increased and that additional school facilities be provided.

We could hardly think of increasing the salaries of the teachers and providing the additional school facilities without also increasing the rate of taxation of the District. And we make in order by this rule both of these legislative propositions for the purpose of enacting legislation on an appropriation bill.

In the matter of the water rates, additional lines are under contemplation and are necessary. The water rate in the District is low. The expense of constructing water mains is now double what it was when the law was enacted as to the price per linear foot now provided for water mains.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The legislation as to the extension of water mains would become permanent, would it not?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Unless repealed.

Mr. MADDEN. This would carry it on its present price. It is not fair to assume that the present price is going to continue.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think there is a legislative provision in the bill with reference to that.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the legislative provision should take into consideration the possibility of a reduction in cost at a future time. It should be so worded as to provide for it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That will be in order when we come to the consideration of the item.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What is meant by water mains and service sewers? The gentleman stated that the cost had practically doubled.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I supposed that the gentleman from Illinois knew what a water main was.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I know what it is in Chicago, but I would hate to pay $2.50 a foot to lay it. I assume that that is not what is meant by the provision here.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I assume that it is the water main that is laid in front of the residence.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. This is the water pipe that runs along the center of the street. The service sewer is one that runs into the house.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman says that this is the water main that runs in the center of the street.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It is the large main that runs up the center of the street.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Those mains differ very much in size.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield me a little time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In a moment. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules saw fit to make in order the legislative provisions in this bill at this time. This rule was brought in, as I have stated, for the purpose of enacting this necessary legislation to increase the salaries of the teachers and provide for additional schools. I do not favor now and am opposed, as I have ever been, to legislation on an appropriation bill. I think that these legislative provisions in this bill should have been brought here by the Committee on the District of Columbia as a separate legislative proposition, rather than to be brought in here on this appropriation bill. But we find ourselves confronted with the necessity of increasing teachers' salaries and providing for additional school facilities coupled up with changes in the tax rate in the District of Columbia, and we find it necessary to allow the legislation on this bill. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, for whatever it is worth, I want to commend the Committee on Rules for bringing in this rule. But I can not agree with the chairman of the Rules Committee when he says that the tax rate provided in this legislation is rather large. I have in my district at least 125 towns and cities where the total municipal, school, county, and State tax rate is larger than the 2½ per cent provided for in this proposed legislation. If I had money to invest in real property—and I am sorry I have not—I would not go to any place in the whole United States other than the city of Washington to invest it if I wanted to get the largest return and pay as little on it in the way of taxation.

I mentioned a moment ago the case of a man whose property was valued by himself and his own real estate agents at being easily worth $15,000. It was assessed by him at only $7,500, and he only paid 1½ per cent on a two-thirds valuation of that $7,500. You can not find a city where the water rate, even the water rate proposed in this bill, is as cheap as it is in the city of Washington, and we have some of the finest water here anywhere in the United States. You can not find a city in the United States where the artificial gas rate is as cheap as it is in Washington. You can not find a city in the United States where the electric light rate is as cheap as it is in the city of Washington. You can not find a city in the whole United States where the facilities for pleasure and enjoyment of life are greater than they are in this city. You have every convenience surrounding you. You have a five-and-a-half-hour schedule service to New York, the greatest metropolis in this country, with splendid trains run each way almost every hour. You have a splendid train service to every portion of the United States out of Washington.

Why the people of Washington, who get the benefit of all of the numerous privileges of living in the National Capital, insist upon living here and not wanting to pay their proper returns in taxes to the country for what is given to them in this great city, I can not understand. The people of this city are supposed to render their property at 100 cents on the dollar and then after they have rendered it at 100 cents on the dollar they are required to pay only on two-thirds of that rendition. Yet, knowing they have to pay on only two-thirds of the rendition, you find rendition after rendition at one-half and even one-third of the cash market value of the property such as I mentioned. I think the distinguished gentleman from Illinois was personally responsible for it and is entitled to credit for bringing to light this incident that I mentioned a few moments ago that came to the attention of the committee.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. Has the gentleman any information upon the question of rents in this city as compared with other cities?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not have to mention that, because there are men in the city who have become rich in the last two years through leasing property and then subleasing it all over this city.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The people here also have the finest railroad station in the country, and yet one can not drive up to the front door or get to the taxicab entrance unless he crosses over the privilege of the Terminal Taxicab Co.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the gentleman's depot in the city of Baltimore is just about in the same fix. Has the gentleman ever done anything to remedy the situation? He can remedy it here in 15 minutes if he can get enough of his colleagues to vote for a proper bill that would control the depot facilities at the terminal station.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I say it is the only railroad station in this country where you can not drive up to the front door and can not get to a side door without crossing over a special privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. Who is to blame? Are we not the guardians of all of the business of this District? Why do we not take action upon that question? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] has brought that matter to the attention of this Congress time and time again and we have done nothing.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] fails to enumerate all of the attractions of the city of Washington. He mentioned the fact that people could get out of Washington and into New York within five and a half hours. What he should have done was to call attention to the fact that there is a five-and-a-half-hour schedule from New York to Washington, and then have called attention to the attractions in Washington, especially in the House of Representatives when the gentleman himself is in action. [Laughter.]

This rule should be agreed to, and I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13266, the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota: Page 2, after line 3, insert:

"The rate of taxation on real estate in the District of Columbia, under the provisions of section 5 of the District of Columbia appropriation act approved July 1, 1902, is hereby increased from 1½ per cent to 2½ per cent, and the rate of taxation on tangible personal property in the District of Columbia, under the provisions of section 6 of the said act, is hereby increased from 1½ per cent to 2½ per cent."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not get the floor for that purpose. The gentleman, under the rule of the House, is not entitled to recognition for that purpose after making a speech on another subject.

Mr. RUCKER. I made a speech on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman should have offered his amendment before he made his speech if he desired to get the floor for that purpose.

Mr. RUCKER. The Chair did not understand my speech, evidently.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman can not take the floor to make a speech and then get recognition for the purpose of offering an amendment under the rules of the House.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri can get recognition later on.

Mr. RUCKER. I do not care for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the committee amendment offered by Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa: At the end of the committee amendment strike out the period and insert "and the rate of taxation on intangible property as provided for in section 9 of the act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1919, is hereby increased from three-tenths of 1 per cent to 1 per cent."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If no one wants to be heard on the point of order, the Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair is going to sustain the point of order, I want to be heard for a minute.

Mr. GARD. I wish the gentleman from Illinois would state his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the committee having made in order that which was not in order certainly would make in order an amendment to the provision authorized by the Committee on Rules. It has been held so many times that I do not believe that it is necessary to argue that question to this Chair. Where a matter which is not in order is passed without a point of order being made upon it and argument had upon it, then the matter which was out of order originally, the point of order against it having been waived, any amendment to that matter out of order is in order. I submit that to the Chair.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to know what the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Ohio did not recognize the point of order I made, I will inform him that the amendment is not germane to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota. It is perfectly plain it is not germane.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman did not state what his point of order was, and I asked if the gentleman would kindly state what it was.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am pleased to tell the gentleman what the point of order is.

Mr. GARD. I thank the gentleman very much. Mr. Chairman, the point of order now made by the gentleman from Illinois is based upon the fact, as he alleges, that this amendment now offered is not germane to the proposition. The point of order as originally made by the gentleman from Illinois, which the Chair sustained, was because this section was placing legislation upon an appropriation bill. Then the Committee on Rules came in and by resolution makes in order, the rules of the House to the contrary notwithstanding, a certain paragraph, which paragraph is included between lines 4 and 10 on page 2. It seems to me that when a subject of legislation is admitted upon an appropriation bill by an authorized way of placing it upon the appropriation bill, to wit, by resolution of the Committee on Rules, that instead of being limited to the exact phraseology authorized by the Committee on Rules, that the authorization of legislation in itself permits an amendment thereto. In other words, that where the Committee on Rules without prohibiting amendment thereto sees proper to place upon the appropriation for the District of Columbia a legislative proposition, that legislative proposition is before this committee of the House to determine whether it will be adopted and that any language which is germane thereto and clearly a question of the amount of the percentage or proportion of percentage is germane. There is no new feature of taxation which applies.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Suppose the rule had made in order an increase only in taxes on real estate. Would it be in order to move to amend by increasing the tax on tangible personal property?

Mr. GARD. I think so; yes, under the language of the rule, and especially where you take up the question of personal property as you do and provide for a tax on tangible personal property.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The subjects are vastly different, are they not?

Mr. GARD. No; they are not. They are different elements of personal property.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If they are not different, then it would not be necessary to differentiate between them in legislative language. The fact that it is necessary to differentiate the one from the other indicates there is a difference.

Mr. GARD. In very many States with which I am familiar there is no difference in the taxation of intangible personal property and tangible personal property.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But the legislation in the District of Columbia has differentiated the one from the other, and the legislation as it appears upon the statute to-day, which was modified by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, changes the law as it is in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GARD. The point I make, and I submit to the good faith of the gentleman and the Chair, is that when the subject of taxation of personal property is brought in and a specific authorization of taxing personal property is made that there is enough of the subject before this committee to authorize an amendment providing for a class of personal property not contained within the actual authorization from the Committee on Rules. In other words, when we put in tangible personal property, as we have done, the bringing in of intangible personal property is certainly germane to the phrase which the gentleman incorporated when he brought the resolution in from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But the change in existing law is authorized in the one case and it is not authorized in the other. The rule authorizes the House to legislate a change in existing law on tangible personal property, but the rule does not authorize the House at this time to make a change in the law with respect to intangible personal property.

Mr. GARD. My contention is that having authorized the change of tangible personal property, which the gentleman did, and which, of course, he admits, then there is enough of the subject before this body to say that when an amendment is proposed as to intangible personal property it is germane to the subject the gentleman brought in, there being no language in the rule itself limiting or preventing any amendment to the matter made in order by the rule.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the question of the germaneness of this amendment depends upon whether or not it is germane to the subject matter. The subject matter is the question of taxation, fixing a rate upon real estate and upon tangible personal property. Now, suppose, instead of the amendment being offered as it has been offered here, that the amendment should be to add after the words "tangible property" the words "intangible property," it certainly would be germane for the reason that it is fixing a rate of taxation upon personal property. The question of personal property is involved in a proposal made in order by the Rules Committee.

We are not without authority on this proposition. When the subject matter is opened up with reference to fixing the taxation upon personal property, whether tangible or intangible, or both, the general proposition is subject to amendment. When made in order the proposal that personal property may be the subject of taxation, it is in the province of this committee to enlarge on the part that is admitted by including within its purview not only tangible property but intangible property. I wish to call the Chair's attention to the authority upon the proposition:

A general subject may be amended by specific propositions of the same class.

Now, what is the class? The class is taxation. Upon what? Upon real estate and personal property. They have defined the classes of property here. One is real estate and the other tangible property. What kind of tangible property? Tangible personal property. Now, tangible personal property is not all the personal property that exists. There is intangible personal property. What is the class? The class is personal property and the subject is taxation. Of what? Personal property. Now, that being true, a general subject may be amended by a specific proposition of the same class. Thus the following has been held to be germane:

To a bill admitting several Territories into the Union, an amendment adding another Territory; to a bill providing for the construction of buildings in each of two cities, an amendment providing for similar buildings in several other cities.

The rule in the latter case was for the erection of a public building in the city of Cincinnati. What was the subject matter? The subject matter was the erection of a building in one particular place. Yet the House is not confined in its deliberation to the building of a public building in one place, and it may include one, two, three, or four, or half a dozen cities.

That is not all. Here is another illustration:

To a resolution embodying two distinct phases of international relationship an amendment embodying a third is germane.

It even goes so far as to say that, if there is a matter involving the policy of the United States Government with a foreign nation, another policy with another nation is germane by way of amendment. Why? Because the subject matter was the fixing of a policy with reference to foreign relationship. Here in this instance the subject matter is taxation. Of what? Of personal property. They mentioned one class. Now, inasmuch as they mentioned a class of personal property, which is tangible personal property, we clearly have the right to include within that classification another kind of personal property—intangible personal, as suggested in the amendment.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. I would like to inquire if in the gentleman's judgment it would be permissible to strike out by amendment the word "tangible"?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There is no question about that. There is not a bit of question, as the gentleman suggests, but that in the consideration of this bill by this body we might strike out the word "tangible," and then there would be nothing left but the real estate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I suggest to the Chair and the gentleman from Indiana that that would be in violation of the rule that has just been agreed to by the House.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is the province of the Rules Committee to bring in a rule, but they can not say that exactly what is confined in the rule shall be all that is subject to consideration. They must admit when they bring in a rule making something out of order in order that everything in the classification included in the subject matter of the proposal is germane and subject to consideration by amendment or otherwise.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I would like the attention of the Chair for just a minute.

I think that most of the gentlemen have missed the very gist of this proposition. The proposition is to increase the tax rate. The effect of the increase of the tax rate is to decrease the percentage which the National Treasury will have to contribute toward the maintenance of the city of Washington. And, Mr. Chairman, I maintain that under the rules of this House, which have been dinged into the ears of every Member on this floor during the time I have been here, that any amendment which results in decreasing the amount to be withdrawn from the National Treasury is in order. Now, by so far as we increase the tax rate of the city of Washington we decrease the amount of money to be drawn from the National Treasury. Hence the amendment is in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer one further suggestion if the Chair will permit me.

The Committee on Rules has made in order the general subject of increasing expenditures; for instance, increasing from $1.25 to $2.50 for laying certain mains, an increase of expense from $1 to $2 for laying of certain sewer connections, and so on, and to meet that increase in expenditure the committee has made in order the general subject of taxation in proportion to the increase of expenditures. Now, the general subject of increase of expenditures and the general subject of taxation to meet that increase of expenditures would make it in order and make germane this amendment.

I submit that suggestion to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], under the rule, has introduced an amendment, as follows:

That the rate of taxation on real estate in the District of Columbia, under the provisions of section 5 of the District of Columbia appropriation act approved July 1, 1902, is hereby increased from 1½ per cent to 2½ per cent, and the rate of taxation on tangible personal property in the District of Columbia, under the provisions of section 6 of the said act, is hereby increased from 1½ per cent to 2½ per cent.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] proposes an amendment, which reads as follows:

And the rate of taxation on intangible property as provided for in section 9 of the act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1919, is hereby increased from three-tenths of 1 per cent to 1 per cent.

To this amendment a point of order has been made, as to its germaneness.

Under the rules of the House, and under the rulings that have been made frequently by gentlemen presiding over the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, it has been held that a paragraph which proposes legislation, being permitted to remain, may be perfected by a germane amendment. But this does not permit an amendment if it adds additional legislation. It can not be contended, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] has undertaken to show, that this will relieve the Treasury of the United States from any additional burden, for on the face of the amendment there is nothing to indicate that the Treasury will be made less liable to expenditures than it has been in the past, and inasmuch as the legislation proposed under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa does introduce new legislation, notwithstanding the fact that it may be germane, the Chair, under all the rules and under all the rulings that he has been able to find, is bound to hold the point of order well taken.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On the last line of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] I move to strike out the figures "2½" and insert the figure "2." I ask the Clerk to report it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: On the last line of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], strike out the figures "2½" and insert in lieu thereof "2."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the members of the Committee on Appropriations, who have given very careful attention to this matter of taxation, are frank enough to say that the figures they put in are what they term arbitrary—that is, they are of their own selection—and therefore I feel justified in offering what seems to me to be a more reasonable amendment.

When we come to consider the question of taxes on personal property, I am of those who believe that the tax rate on intangible personal property in the District of Columbia is too low. One-third of 1 per cent on intangible property is too low. On the other hand, in the matter of tangible personal property, the small stock of goods, and the tools of trade, the very apparent merchandise which a man has, his horse or his small automobile, are among the things which belong to the small, humble citizen here in the District of Columbia—and there are hundreds of thousands of them—and very few proportionately of those whose great wealth is in intangible personal property. It is now proposed to increase by 66⅔ per cent all tax on the tangible personal property of the citizen of moderate means.

Personally I think this tax is too high. The amount of money it brings in is inconsequential in the scheme of things, I take it, since there is also a report of 2½ per cent, or 66 per cent, increase on the taxation on real estate. But the taxes on tangible personal property do not bring in very much in the first instance, and the holdings of the poor and humble are now arbitrarily included in the scheme of an advance of 66 per cent.

You have a very peculiar taxation in the District of Columbia. I am happy to know that the continued sentiment of the House is against the fiction of the so-called half and half. Another peculiar system they have here of taxation is of attempting to raise money continually by taxation and evading a responsibility such as it would have in a bonded indebtedness. It may be interesting to the members of the committee generally to know that in 1922 there will not be a dollar of bonded indebtedness in the District of Columbia. No city, no county, in the United States will be in such position. It may also be interesting to know that they will have a surplus of accumulated funds, heretofore unnecessary, of about $5,000,000.

Now, the true principle of taxation is to tax as the taxes are needed and where extraordinary improvements are made, like the building of a necessary bridge and the building of necessary schoolhouses, and I am in favor of these things; the true principle about that is that a bond issue should take the place of a radical, peremptory rise in taxes.

Now, I appreciate the remarks of Col. Kutz, one of the District Commissioners, when he says that the cities generally throughout the country have increased their taxes. He said that his taxes in Seattle, I believe, were increased 33⅓ per cent, and therefore we may adopt as being true the findings of the Subcommittee on Appropriations that it was necessary in the matter of reporting increases in salaries for teachers and the building of necessary schoolhouses, both of which everybody wants to see done, that the increase be made in the matter of rates of taxation. But the increase on this tangible personal property is unnecessary and brings so little of an addition that it seems to me as striking particularly at the people who should be exempted from taxation rather than increased taxation.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate what the gentleman from Ohio has said, but I believe that one of the just features of taxation in this city would be an increase in the intangible-property tax, because that tax would come from the comparatively rich people. But, as you have just witnessed, a point of order has been made and sustained against it. In other words, the wealthy men of this city, owning immense quantities of stocks and bonds, are comparatively relieved from taxation.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Could it not have been put into the rule just the same as the other?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It is not too late yet to make another rule. This rule does not cover all the legislation in this bill; neither is the bill anywhere near completion.

Mr. McKEOWN. I hope the Rules Committee will report a rule making it in order, so that wealth shall not escape just taxation.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Is not the exemption on personal property rather large?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. In anticipation of the gentleman's question, I was going to say—and I think this had some influence with the committee—there are a large number of residents of Washington who are not home owners. They are tenants. They have small quantities of personal property. Some of them have horses, drays, and so forth. A large number of people here are in this condition. The only excuse for raising this from 1½ to 2½ per cent, to my mind, was because of the large exemption given to the poor man. True, that exemption is given to the rich man just the same on personal property, but owing to the fact that this great exemption of $1,000 affects more poor people than it does rich people, the committee were willing to report this increase. I presume it is no doubt true that thousands upon thousands of poor people in the District of Columbia, because of this exemption of $1,000, are exempt from taxation at all, and it is only the more wealthy class that this 2½ per cent rate would touch. That was one of the reasons that influenced me in consenting to the raising of the taxation upon tangible personal property from 1½ to 2½ per cent.

Mr. BEE. In that $1,000 exemption is there not included the horses and mules and drays and wagons of which the gentleman spoke?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Everything in the way of tangible personal property.

Mr. BEE. Therefore the poor man would have to have a thousand dollars worth of property before he would be called on to pay anything at all?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Absolutely. I have been pretty familiar with taxation for a great many years, and in my State I think the exemption is only $100. In some other States it may be $200 or $300; but here under previous law it is made $1,000. A man who has more than $1,000 worth of personal property is, as a rule, in comparatively easy circumstances. Therefore the increase to 2½ per cent on the balance of his personal property does not affect him as much. Certainly if I had a million dollars worth of personal property I ought not to complain at paying my share of the taxes at the rate of 2½ per cent, which is lower than in any State in the Union or any city in the United States.

Mr. BEE. But it will make a man with a million dollars worth of property pay something.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes; and that was one fact that I had in my mind.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. In most of the States they have an inheritance tax which helps out and saves something in the way of burdens on the people, but there is nothing of that kind in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I know of nothing of that kind. I hate to say it, because I do not think it is true in all cases, but I have heard it said that this is the asylum of tax dodgers. I will not say that. If the gentleman goes on to enumerate some more of the things that the residents of Washington are exempt from he may prove that assertion.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. We have had notable instances of that kind in my State of people who have come to Washington to escape taxation.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] will be voted down. In addition to what the chairman of the subcommittee has just stated, the $1,000 exemption takes care of all that class of people whom the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] is solicitous about. If you should reduce the personal property tax below the real estate tax and an additional expense should fall later upon the people of the District, you would increase the burden of tax on the poor man's home. Now, the great mercantile establishments in this city, the great department stores with all of their goods on their shelves, many of whom own very little real estate in the District of Columbia, ought to pay their full share of taxes just as the small home owner pays his. So I see no reason why you should exempt the personal property that is engaged in business, which is very great in amount. There is an enormous tax that comes from all the vast business houses of the District of Columbia, filled as they are with goods of all kind and character. The average stocks of goods carried in the stores of the city of Washington are taxed under this provision of law.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Are they not taxed otherwise?

Mr. SISSON. Personal property has been taxed just as other property, always.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Why, in the bill itself, was there no tax placed upon intangible property? It would seem to the average man on the street that intangible property, of all property in Washington, is the property that is perhaps most leniently dealt with in taxation.

Mr. SISSON. Personally I am strongly in favor of the taxation of intangible property. For a long time intangible personal property escaped taxation entirely in the District of Columbia, but a provision went on the appropriation bill some years ago endeavoring to tax intangible property as other property is taxed. That bill went over to the Senate and was held up there, and the appropriation bill came very near failing on that account. Finally the conferees agreed on three-tenths of 1 per cent, which was all the Senate would agree to. Now, if I had my way about it I would be very glad to vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa increasing the tax on intangible personal property.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Why was it not put in this bill? That is what I want to know.

Mr. SISSON. There are a great many things that this committee would like to put in this bill. At the time we were considering these matters we could not tell that we could convince the Rules Committee that all these items were necessary. We felt that the legislative committees of the House would generally complain about our putting legislation on the appropriation bill. You know this is not a legislative committee, but an appropriating committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If you raised the rate on intangible personal property you could easily have gotten enough to take care of the additional expenses.

Mr. SISSON. In order to do that I want to say to the gentleman that we would have been compelled to take care of additional facilities in the department of the Government dealing with taxation. That would have to be taken care of in order to get the additional help necessary. Every time you add new items of additional taxation you have to increase the number of employees.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does it take any more employees to collect the taxes on intangible property than on tangible?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; they are a different set of employees.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is just a mere matter of bookkeeping.

Mr. SISSON. Well, I take it that if anybody has anything to do with the bookkeeping in the departments he will understand the reason.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I know that all Government operations are expensive.

Mr. SISSON. We are always confronted with the difficulty of finding intangible personal property.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It seems to me that you might raise the tax on intangible property and have it collected by the same department that now collects the intangible tax; it would only cost a fraction more.

Mr. SISSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Missouri that this has been a place where many men of great wealth have come, and until the three-tenths of 1 per cent on intangible property was imposed escaped taxation entirely. I can mention one case, because it got into the court, of a man who got up the Postum cereal, a substitute for coffee. He got to be very rich. He moved into the District of Columbia, bought a home, or built one, and after staying here long enough closed up his house, walled up the windows, and went back. When he died the question of taxation got into court, and his administrator was able to show that he was a citizen of the District of Columbia, thereby escaping the inheritance tax and the income tax in his own State, where he had made his money, and was not taxed a cent in the District of Columbia on this vast fortune. These cases we might have been able to reach, but in order to do that it requires a great deal of legislation, and your committee dealt with every phase of the case that the committee thought that the House would stand for.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to challenge the author of this amendment, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], to give us the name of one single rural community, one single village, or town or city, in his district in Ohio where the property owners are treated so leniently concerning taxes as the property owners are in the District of Columbia; where the property owners are allowed $1,000 exemption; where the property owners are taxed only 1½ per cent, even where the property owners are taxed what we propose to tax them, 2½ per cent; where the property owners are taxed on their intangible property only three-tenths of 1 per cent?

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman has issued a challenge. I say that in my State the theory of taxation is that no tax, or a very limited tax, is placed upon small personal property, and none on tools of trade or occupational goods.

Mr. BLANTON. Here they have an exemption up to $1,000 to start with. Where the gentleman's constituents in Ohio have a smaller exemption, where they have to pay a greater tax on real estate and tangible personal property, and a greater tax on intangible property, why should the gentleman in his position as a legislator here seek by this amendment to cast a greater tax burden upon his constituents in Ohio who have to pay not only their own taxes in his district and State but who have to meet partly the increased expenses of the people of the District of Columbia, whose taxes are comparatively a mere bagatelle. Why, when we come to consider the fact that our constituents of the various districts are taxed not only in their State, county, and towns and school districts for their local expenses but they are also taxed every year by the Federal Government to meet a part of the expenses for paving the streets of Washington and building many of the fine bridges, like the so-called million-dollar bridge on Connecticut Avenue and many other fine bridges here, we should realize fully the great injustice that is done them. I say it places too great a burden of the taxes on the people of our districts rather than on the favored few in the city of Washington. I hope the gentleman's amendment will not pass, but that the committee's provision that was eliminated on the point of order will be placed back into the bill as proposed by the chairman [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will vote down this amendment. It is not right to tax the humble Government employee and home owner who owns merely his home 2½ per cent and then tax the merchant who owns $50,000 or $150,000 stock of goods only 2 per cent. It is not right, and I hope the House will vote the amendment down.

In connection with this tax proposition, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have a letter and statement, prepared by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia at my request, made a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The letter and statement are as follows:

COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Washington, March 26, 1920.

Hon. JAMES P. BUCHANAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia in submitting their estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, were compelled to omit items which they deemed necessary for the proper support and maintenance of the municipal government and for municipal improvements aggregating the sum of of $6,677,000.

In the first instance on account of the fact that Congress had established a Joint Commission for the Reclassification of Salaries, they were advised by the Secretary of the Treasury that they should not submit estimates for increases in salaries of employees. This prevented a presentation to Congress of a matter which in the judgment of the commissioners is vitally important to the conduct of the municipal establishment. If it had not been for this prohibition they would have submitted increases in salaries aggregating the sum of $1,500,000. These increases not to be in lieu of the $240 bonus, but based upon their present basic salary with the understanding that the present bonus would be continued for all municipal employees affected by it.

Other estimates were reduced or omitted entirely because of the fact that the commissioners were compelled under the act of 1909 to limit their estimates to an amount not to exceed twice the sum of the estimated revenues for the ensuing fiscal year. When the commissioners were considering the estimates submitted by their subordinates they realized that extreme economy was required in every branch of the municipal government if the estimates were to be held within the limitation prescribed by law. With that in view they reduced many estimates and disregarded altogether many meritorious projects recommended by their subordinates.

After this careful process of pruning had been completed the commissioners found that the total of the estimates they had approved exceeded the limitation imposed upon them by law by an amount of approximately $2,750,000. It was necessary, therefore, for them to again revise their estimates, reducing many items to amounts which they deem insufficient and omitting altogether many other items which in their judgment were necessary and should have been presented in the estimates.

One very important item which they omitted altogether was an estimate submitted by the Secretary of War for $2,000,000 for commencing work on a project for securing additional water supply for the District.

Items submitted by the board of education for school buildings and sites for school buildings aggregating $927,000 were omitted altogether from the commissioners' estimates, notwithstanding the fact that the commissioners believe that all of the items comprised in this total were necessary for the proper development of the public-school system of the District. Another important matter which was omitted entirely by the commissioners was a provision for sites for municipal city refuse stations and stables aggregating $500,000.

Work should be begun upon a new bridge to take the place of the existing Calvert Street Bridge, the plans for which were authorized by Congress some years ago. An item of $500,000 for this purpose was omitted. The street and highway system of the District of Columbia is far below the standard which was maintained for many years in Washington, and the commissioners were forced to eliminate street-improvement items to an amount of about $250,000. The estimates for the expenditure of the sewage system of the city was reduced by $150,000.

Building items recommended by the chief engineer of the fire department for new fire stations and buildings to take the place of fire stations built more than 60 years ago amount to about $100,000, none of them being submitted by the commissioners in their estimates.

The commissioners were earnestly besought by many organizations representing the commercial and industrial life of the city to provide in their estimates for certain park areas which, unless they are acquired, will soon be built upon and thus lost forever for park purposes. These items alone, if they had been submitted, would have increased the estimates by $1,250,000, comprising $750,000 for the Dean tract and $500,000 for the Patterson tract. These items were recommended by the commissioners in former estimates and both were included in one of the bills that were formerly presented to Congress.

This represents the larger items which were omitted by the commissioners, and a great many similar estimates were reduced to figures representing amounts less than would be required to adequately maintain and support the municipal government. The items described above which were omitted from the estimates by the commissioners aggregate $6,677,000, as is shown in the tables.

Very respectfully,

THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
By LOUIS BROWNLOW, President.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of making an apology. I made the point of order on the original paragraph in the bill, although one Member stated that nobody but a mossback would do it. If so, I suppose I am a mossback. I made the point of order on the proposition increasing the intangible-property tax, although a distinguished member of the committee said that I did it in the interest of wealth. Perhaps I did.

I will tell the Members of the House why I did it in both cases. I believe in intelligent legislation. The Committee on Appropriations, or the subcommittee, does not. That is the difference between us. I believe that when you impose taxes on the people they ought to be imposed after intelligent consideration. I know very little about tax rates except the payment of taxes. I am a large taxpayer at home for a very small value of property. I do not pay a cent of tax in the District of Columbia, never have, and never expect to. There have been a great many discussions concerning tax rates held throughout the United States for years. At times I have taken a sort of academic interest in them, although I do not profess to know much about the subject matter.

I submit that I do not know much about tax rates. The only difference between me and the subcommittee on appropriations is that they do not admit it. That is the only distinction—I admit it. I would be perfectly willing to let even the subcommittee on the District appropriation bill of the Committee on Appropriations take up the tax matter and give intelligent and careful consideration to the subject and abide by their judgment. We have, however, a legislative committee of this House which has legislative jurisdiction over matters of this kind. I have sat in this House for years and I have heard certain gentlemen urge that there ought to be a consideration of the tax matters of the District of Columbia. If any of those gentlemen have introduced a bill on the subject it has escaped my attention, and I watch these things fairly well. If any committee has recently considered the subject, that has escaped my attention, although probably that would not be brought to my attention. No; we go upon the hop, skip, and jump plan.

The Committee on Appropriations brings in to-day a proposition to raise the tax rates on tangible personal property, and the members of that committee all get up and say, "We think we ought to raise the tax on intangible personal property." When I ask why they did not include that in their bill, I will not say that the gentleman who was asked floundered, because he is facile and adept at giving reasons, but I can tell the gentleman who asked the question why they did not put it in. They did not happen to think of it at the exact moment they wrote that paragraph in the bill. That is all there is to it. If they had happened to think of it, they would have put it in. They were in favor of it. The proposition was put in without intelligent consideration. If this House wants to have an increase or a proper consideration of the tax rate in the District of Columbia, it ought to direct some committee of the House, or otherwise, to consider and report upon the subject. I do not know whether the tax rate here is too high. I heard one gentleman here say that in no place in his district was there a tax rate of less than 2½ per cent on the real value of the property. I do not believe that is correct, but if it is, then they are a set of highway robbers in his district.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I doubt whether there is a place in the United States where there is a pretense of an honest administration of government where the tax rate amounts to 2½ per cent of the real value of the property. Of course, I know that where people elect their assessors and direct their assessors to tax property at the real value, the assessors have a way of finding the real value away below the actual market value. I have seen that at home. I have seen it elsewhere where I have happened to own real estate. They do not elect the assessor in Washington. I do not know how fair the valuation may be. There is no reason why it should not be in the main a fair valuation. I do not care what taxes they pay here. I believe that the Congress of the United States when it undertakes to legislate in reference to taxes ought to do it with some degree of knowledge and intelligence, and I do not believe that that is the method that we are pursuing.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Does my colleague think that the people of the city of Washington should be aided by giving them such advantage that the citizens of this city do not pay taxes equal to those paid by the citizens of other communities?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Government of the United States owns a very large portion of the property in the District of Columbia. Better improvements are demanded in this city than would be here if it were not the seat of government. I think the people of the United States, for these reasons, ought to pay a reasonable proportion of the cost of maintaining the government of the city of Washington. [Applause.] Whether that is 50–50 or some other proportion, I do not undertake to say. I think myself it ought to be a fixed proportion, and I think that somebody ought to intelligently consider the subject.

Mr. MONTAGUE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the debate upon this amendment is closed.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has already been recognized.

Mr. WALSH. But I make the point of order that the debate upon the amendment to the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BLANTON. And I make the point of order that the gentleman from Virginia has moved to strike out the last two words.

Mr. WALSH. I make the point of order that that amendment is not in order, being an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, the Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will overrule the point of order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order, and the gentleman from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to detain the committee for a moment to express my surprise, after seven years of service here, at the situation that confronts us. We have had it called to our attention during these years that the great trouble at Washington is that the city has become a haven of refuge for tax dodgers, and that they find their profit and safety in their ability to escape taxes on their enormous intangible holdings. For seven years that argument has been pressed with vigor and vehemence in this House. This committee now, whether by long or by short consideration, whether by thoughtlessness, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]—in which I do not concur or disapprove—brings in a piece of legislation by which the poorer class of people shall be made to bear the increased burden of taxation, an increase in the rate upon realty and tangible personal property. It is contended that an exemption of $1,000 upon tangible personalty is a concession to the poor. But we do not exempt $1,000 on the poor man's land. Where a man is struggling to own a little home, whose value will not exceed perhaps one or two thousand dollars, do you allow an exemption upon that, pending the payment of the purchase money? We must have been deluded during these years, when we have been told that Washington is a refuge for people wishing to escape taxes upon intangible holdings, and, therefore, we are now asked to recoup by putting the burden on those who can least afford to bear it. I can not comprehend the wisdom or the justice of such a plan.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. What is pending before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WALSH. What has become of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia to strike out the last two words?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that to have been withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH. But it has not been withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I withdraw that.

Mr. SISSON. No; I want to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, and I will ask him not to withdraw it. Mr. Chairman, occasionally in this House there arises a critic [Mr. MANN of Illinois] who denounces the intelligence of Members and of members of committees with great flippancy and with an assumption of absolute, accurate, and unerring knowledge and with a display of arrogance not equaled in any other legislative body in the world.

Nor do I believe that the assault upon the members of the Committee on Appropriations, a majority of whom are Republicans, is warranted. I do not believe that a single member of this subcommittee would do him or any Member of Congress an intentional injustice, yet the gentleman goes out of the way to insult them. He is utterly unfair, and he knows that he is unfair. But the House is accustomed to this, and he does little harm. Now, this committee considered this matter for a great many years in its every phase. Many of you gentlemen who have been members of State legislatures or city councils understand that when a State or city budget is to be made up the legislature of a State or the aldermen of the city then levy the tax that is necessary to pay the expenses of the State or city government as the case may be and in doing it they had no more knowledge of conditions and not as much, because you can not get the exact conditions in an entire State as quickly as you could in one city like the District of Columbia. In levying these taxes upon these people we took into consideration the fact that there was a thousand dollars of personal property exempt. I will say to my friend from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] that the argument he makes against the taxation of real estate in the District of Columbia is the same argument that can be made in every community in the United States. There is no exemption in any State, that I know of, of real estate. Real estate is subject to taxation and will always be the principal source of revenue in the State or county governments. We are here dealing with a locality. When you shall take into consideration what is being done now by every city in the United States and obtain what the people of the District of Columbia here say they want, you will find that the committee that came before this subcommittee representing, as they did, 30 or 40 of the various organizations in the District of Columbia, coming from the business organizations, coming from the various community organizations and citizens' associations, asked us that these taxes be increased, because they wanted the improvements. They have had their day in court.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. After this vote is put and this particular amendment is disposed of, will another amendment be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, strike out the word "intangible."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the gentleman will reserve that.

Mr. GOOD. I will reserve it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If the gentleman desires to discuss——

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like very much to say a few words.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Does the gentleman from South Carolina want the floor?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will try to obtain it later. Go ahead.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the discussion of this District tax matter for several years, and I appreciate that the committee having charge of it have given it close attention. I have no criticism of them, but am altogether unable to agree with their recommendation. I am willing to believe, if the committee can get any satisfaction out of it, that they have done the best they could.

I see no reason for a fixed rate of taxation in this District, and the idea of a fixed rate is contrary, in my judgment, to proper principles of taxation. I can see no reason why the rate in this city can not be ascertained and the taxes levied as in other cities. A budget is, of course, made by which it is ascertained how much money must be raised. The property is assessed so the total valuation of property subject to taxation is known. Dividing one by the other gives the rate, and a rate ascertained in any other way is improper. In no section of the country I know anything about would a rate ascertained in any other way be legal; no taxes could be collected on a rate made up in the way suggested it should be made up here. I see no reason for a fixed rate, although I know a fixed rate has for some reason or excuse prevailed here.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. The rate is now fixed, and has been fixed since 1878.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Well, there may possibly be some excuse for a fixed rate where the General Government has to pay part of the expenses of the city, but where a plan is worked out by which the property of the city has to bear the entire expense of the city and the Government only comes to the rescue in case of an emergency or to make good a deficit or to take part in some unusual expense, there is, in my judgment, no excuse for a fixed rate.

I wish to say only a word more. I agree most heartily with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said, to the effect that the Government of the United States ought to bear a share of taxation in this District. It is niggardly on the part of the Government to try to escape it. It is unfair to the city and its people for the Government to take means to escape that obligation. In my judgment a fair valuation should be put upon property belonging to the Federal Government and a method ought to be arrived at to ascertain the proportion the valuation so reached bears to the total valuation of the District. The relative value of the property of the Government and of the general property belonging to the people should be determined, and when that proportion is reached it ought to determine for a term of years the portion which each should pay. I am altogether out of sympathy with the idea that the Government should escape its fair and reasonable share of taxes in the District.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, and I want to say just a few words about this matter of taxes. I have always been taught that the fundamental rule of taxation should be equality to everybody according to that which they have.

That is written in most of the constitutions of the States, and that was my idea a few minutes ago when I moved to strike out the word "tangible" here, because I can not see why a man who has $1,500 worth of personal property of the tangible kind and pays under this proposition 2½ per cent tax on it is not discriminated against, when a man who owns a mortgage on his home for $1,500, and therefore has it in an intangible form, would pay three-tenths of 1 per cent, or about that rate, as I understand it. In other words, you are saying to the man who puts his money into that which is the best investment in the world, "You can live here and pay only a nominal tax on it," whereas you say to a man who buys his home, which is out in the open where anybody can tax it, "You have got to pay 2½ per cent on your property," and notwithstanding the fact that the man who holds a mortgage on it is paying only three-tenths of 1 per cent and men who are holding bonds that are taxable are paying just that way. That violates the fundamental principle of equity and fundamental principle of taxation, and I can not understand why it should not be corrected here as well as elsewhere.

You say you have a great deal of difficulty in getting at it. That is true, and that is so much more reason why the intangible property man should pay a full rate on his property when you catch him, because you have got to spend a lot of time in getting at him. And he is able to pay it. That is the fundamental error in this proposition.

Now, there is one other thing about it I do not like. It has been published and it has been stated that there is a surplus of some $6,000,000 to the credit of the District of Columbia now, on account of taxation that has been collected and not spent. That being the case, I do not understand why you have got to increase the tax rate from 1½ to 2½ per cent.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield.

Mr. SISSON. I will say to the gentleman that the surplus which he speaks of is estimated now at about $4,000,000, but if the expenses of the District shall be met now, that would be wiped out and gone entirely.

Mr. STEVENSON. In other words, if you put all the expenses of the District of Columbia upon the District, then it will soon be gone?

Mr. SISSON. No. Let the Government bear what it is now bearing of the expenses, and it will wipe that out, with the additional appropriations that are needed right now.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am glad I have secured that information. I have been here several sessions, and it seems to be always here when we are considering this bill. I will say that when you impose taxes on the principle of inequality found here, it is indefensible in a civilized country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 11.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL EXPENSES.

Executive office: Two commissioners, at $6,000 each; engineer commissioner, so much as may be necessary (to make salary $6,000); secretary, $2,700; 3 assistant secretaries to commissioners at $1,600 each; clerks—1 $1,500, 3 at $1,400 each, 1 $1,200, 1 (who shall be a stenographer and typewriter) $1,200, 1 $840, 2 at $720 each; 2 messengers, at $600 each; stenographer and typewriter, $1,200.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I am aware that this is subject to a point of order. It is to raise the salaries of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and on that I wish to say this: I have been connected with the District government in many ways for the last 15 or 16 years, and I have been upon the Appropriations Committee for a great many years. I have been requested to raise salaries for thousands of people, and I am in favor of it, and I have done so; but I wish to say this: That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are the hardest-worked men in the city of Washington. They work more hours than anybody else connected with the Government here, are more studious of its requirements, and, in my judgment, exercise the best of their ability at all times.

But I know that this item is subject to a point of order. However, I wished to put in the RECORD a few words showing my esteem and regard for the industry and ability of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the very pathetic sentiments expressed by the gentleman in behalf of these officers, but they are certainly not worth the increase. I am a little surprised at the gentleman's moderation, in that he did not double the salary or treble it.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I wish to say that the commissioners' salaries were fixed in 1878, at a time when we had about 90,000 people here. Their work has quadrupled since then, and more than quadrupled, and where they handled about $3,000,000 annually then they are handling now $18,000,000 annually.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Has the committee found out how many cities in the country pay salaries of over $5,000 to their mayors?

Mr. SISSON. Officials of this kind who occupy these positions in cities as large as Washington are paid more than we pay here.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Did the committee investigate and find out how many cities pay their mayors over $5,000 a year in salary?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; a great many pay more than $5,000. New York and the gentleman's own city of Chicago pay more. A great many of them pay more. We did not summon the mayers, in order to find out what they got, but we did know what the municipalities were paying, according to the reports, which you can get and which are available, as salaries of municipal officers.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course, it is a very easy matter to ascertain, and I wondered whether it had been ascertained.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, for the reasons stated by myself, supplemented by the statements of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], I make the point of order upon the language in lines 12 and 14, "Two commissioners, at $6,000 each," and "to make salary $6,000," in line 14, in that it is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask to amend by reinserting the figures "$5,000" in both places where the figures "$6,000" have been stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota: Page 2, line 12, strike out the figures "$6,000" and insert in lieu thereof——

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. That would not remedy the matter——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I understand the gentleman to make the point of order on these figures or salaries. I wish now to simply reinsert the old salaries of $5,000 in each instance.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Let us have the amendment reported in full.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota: Page 2, line 12, after the word "at," insert "$5,000," and in line 14, after the word "salary," insert "$5,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. McKEOWN. I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. When the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON], I believe, offered an amendment to strike out the word "tangible" on line 8, of page 2, the paragraph already passed, a point of order was made and sustained. I take it that that was sustained on the theory that the rule covered only the language that had been reported.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, as a general thing, of course, it is in order to strike out, but it has been held on a good many occasions that where a motion to strike out a word, such as the word "not," for instance, so as absolutely to reverse what was intended, it may not be in order. It sometimes is, but it is here held not in order because it accomplishes something by striking out that you could not accomplish by inserting. In this particular case the Chair had already sustained a point of order to an amendment to insert a specific provision with reference to the intangible property. The effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina was to insert it, which amounted to the same thing.

Mr. McKEOWN. The thing I wanted to bring out was that there was not any ruling to the effect that the Committee on Rules could write an amendment and bring it in here and compel us to take that language simply because it had been reported.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Rules Committee could bring in a proposition and the House could adopt it.

Mr. McKEOWN. I did not want to concede that right. I withdraw my amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchasing division: Purchasing officer, $3,000; deputy purchasing officer, $1,800; computer, $1,440; clerks—1 $1,800, 1 $1,600, 3 at $1,500 each, 12 at $1,200 each (5 of whom shall be stenographers and typewriters), 1 $1,100, 3 at $1,000 each; storekeeper, $1,200; messenger, $600; driver, $600; inspectors—1 of materials $1,400, 2 at $900 each; 2 property-yard keepers, at $1,000 each; temporary labor, $250.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, what is the necessity in this particular division for these increases? You have increased and doubled the number of $1,200 clerks, apparently, and increased the salaries of some others, and inserted a new one at $1,600. What particular activity necessitates that?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. We have not increased the number here at all. We have dropped three clerks at $840 each, and we have dropped two laborers at $720 each.

Mr. WALSH. You do not call laborers "clerks," do you?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No. I say we dropped seven clerks at $740 each and put six at $1,200, simply putting them on a living basis, and one at $1,600.

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. We have not increased the number here, but we have really increased the amount of salaries, for the increase is $2,000 in the purchasing division. I want to say that the matters down there have increased wonderfully of late They really handle in this department $3,000,000 worth of property, and it has been increasing recently, and very rapidly, especially in the last year, so that the committee is satisfied that they ought to have some more efficient clerks, and in order to get them you have to increase the salaries.

Mr. WALSH. You say you increased them from $840 to $1,200 in order to put them on a living basis. Well, we have a lot of clerks elsewhere in this bill at $900. Does the gentleman state that those clerks are not on a living basis?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I would state that those clerks are above the average $900 clerks. There is no question about it. They are down in the District of Columbia office, and nearly all of them are experts in their line.

Mr. WALSH. Well, there may be a few under the District government that are experts, but a great many of them are just the ordinary run of what we got here during the war, nonexpert and nonefficient. What is the need of this new clerk at $1,600?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Well, he is virtually the foreman of everybody below him, I may say.

Mr. WALSH. You have one at $1,800.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. This city government is a little bit different from the government of any other city in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I will reserve a further point of order on another item.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. In a city of this size everywhere in the United States——

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is undertaking now to tell me——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes; I am undertaking to tell the gentleman of the necessity. In other words, this is a city almost as large as the city of Minneapolis, Minn.; almost as large as Kansas City; almost as large as Boston; almost as large as Cleveland; and almost as large, if not quite, as Cincinnati, and so forth. In all these cities—we will not say anything about Chicago or New York——

Mr. WALSH. I hope not.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It would take you a long while to get through with them.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes; and I was there before the gentleman was. Now, in all these cities they have a board of aldermen.

Mr. WALSH. This $1,600 clerk is to take the place of the board of aldermen?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No. If the gentleman will permit, I will instruct him in the duties of the city government. The board of aldermen in some of these cities that I have mentioned consists of 15 or 20 men. Then there is the mayor, with his clerks, and so forth. Here are the aldermen, and they all work the whole year through. Down in this District Building—which, by the way, is one of the finest city halls in the United States, thanks to the generosity of Congress—instead of a mayor and a board of aldermen to conduct the business you have three commissioners, and those three commissioners, with this little collection of clerks that you see here, run the entire city government, when the city of Boston or the city of Minneapolis hires perhaps four or five times as many people.

That is why I made the statement here a little while ago to the effect that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are the hardest-worked men I ever saw in my life, because they have virtually to take the place of the 15 or 20 aldermen in all these other cities.

Mr. WALSH. That is a very lucid statement. The gentleman has tried to increase the salaries of the commissioners and to give them additional clerks. I make a point of order, on line 24, against "1 clerk at $1,600," and I withdraw it as to the others.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, executive office, $128,270.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that that total should be corrected, and perhaps it would be well to get the authority to do so.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent that the clerk be authorized to correct all totals in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the clerk be authorized to correct the totals in the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assessor's office: Assessor, $3,500; assistant assessors—3 at $3,000 each, 1 at $2,000; 5 field men at $2,000 each; record clerks—one $1,800, 2 at $1,500 each, 2 (who shall also be typists) at $1,400 each, one $1,200; clerks—3 at $1,400 each, 2 at $1,200 each, 4 at $1,000 each, one $900, one $720; draftsmen—one $1,600, 2 at $1,200 each; 2 stenographers and typwriters at $1,200 each; assistant or clerk, $900; messenger, $600; board of assistant assessors—clerk, $1,500, vault clerk, $900; messenger and driver, $600; temporary clerk hire, $500; in all, $56,920.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. How is the assessor for the District selected?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. He is appointed by the commissioners.

Mr. WALSH. So that this criticism we have heard with reference to assessing property at its proper value could be eliminated, I presume, if the commissioners should appoint a more competent or expert person to make the assessments?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I believe he can be removed only for cause.

Mr. WALSH. How long is his term of office?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Indefinite.

Mr. WALSH. The commissioners can appoint him for life, can they?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They can retain him as long as they are there. The new commissioners might remove him in some way for cause.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The assessor of the District died only a year or two ago.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Not very long ago.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Not a great while ago. I think the appointment is for good behavior, anyhow; so that he can make an honest assessment, which he probably has made, though apparently no one here believes it.

Mr. WALSH. No one here has been willing to admit it, I think, during the discussion we have had.

I should like to ask the chairman of the committee also with reference to the assistant assessors. Are they also appointed by the commissioners?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They are.

Mr. WALSH. And the five field men?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They are.

Mr. WALSH. The entire office force of the assessors is under the jurisdiction of the commissioners?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And the appointments are made by the commissioners?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes. In other words, as I stated to the gentleman a while ago, these three commissioners attend to the entire administration of the government of the city of Washington, the same as the board of aldermen and the mayor of Boston, and all the city government combined. They have it all in their hands.

Mr. WALSH. And they run the street railways besides?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes; they are the public-utilities commissioners besides.

Mr. WALSH. They are making just about as good a job at the one task as they are at the other.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. In addition to their other duties in running the entire government of the city of Washington they have had placed upon their shoulders by the action of Congress the duties of the utility commission, which duties occupy them at least one-third of their time. As to whether that ought to be so or not is another question, but they have had those duties thrust upon them by legislation.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Personal tax board: Three assistant assessors of personal taxes, at $3,000 each; chief inspector of personal property, $1,800; appraiser of personal property, $1,800; clerk, $1,400; assistant clerk, $1,000; 2 inspectors, at $1,200 each; extra clerk hire, $2,000; intangible personal property—2 clerks at $1,500 each, 5 inspectors at $1,200 each clerk to board of personal tax assessors, $1,800, 2 clerks at $1,200 each; in all, $32,600.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the chief inspector of personal property, $1,800, in line 25, page 4. What is the reason for creating that position?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think the position of chief inspector was created chiefly in consequence of the passage of the intangible tax law. In consequence of that they had to have additional service. You know they collect about $800,000 taxes on intangible personal property, which is the hardest tax on earth to dig up and find out. That is a very difficult thing to do. This man was appointed chiefly in consequence of the additional duties thrust upon the commissioners in the collection of this intangible personal property tax. That is my recollection about it.

Mr. WALSH. Was it authorized in the law?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The law authorized no employees whatever. Hence I question whether a point of order would lie against it or not.

Mr. WALSH. They have a generous staff here—three assistant assessors of personal taxes, inspectors, clerks, assistant clerks, and appraisers.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And they collect about $800,000 in taxes of the hardest kind to collect in the world.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think the number of clerks should be fixed in accordance with the amount they collect? If they come in with a collection of $1,000,000 next year in the way of intangible property tax, does the gentleman think they ought to have another chief inspector?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think if they had another chief inspector with his eyes sufficiently open, he might dig up a lot of these tax dodgers that they have not been able to catch yet.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know about that. I make a point of order against the chief inspector of personal property, $1,800, in line 25, page 4.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I oppose that, on the theory that there is no law fixing these positions, and they have got to have the employees. It is not a change of existing law at all. The positions exist only as they are appropriated for.

Mr. WALSH. It is certainly a change of existing law, because it creates the position of chief inspector of personal property at $1,800. That is different from a clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. All right. Let it go.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of corporation counsel: Corporation counsel, $4,500; assistants—first $3,000, second $2,500, third $2,000, fourth $1,800, fifth $1,500, sixth $1,500, seventh $1,500; clerk, $1,400; stenographer and typewriter, $1,200; 2 stenographers, at $900 each; clerk, $720; in all, $23,420.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield to me to allow me to ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] has the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. Go ahead.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I should like to inquire what is the method of the selection of these clerks and employees in the various departments of the government of the District of Columbia? Is there any kind of a civil-service system in the District? Are examinations held for these appointments, or do the commissioners select them entirely in their own way and according to their own pleasure?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They are appointed by the commissioners.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There is no other responsibility for their appointment but the commissioners themselves?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Are the clerks appointed under the civil-service law in the District?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They are not.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to find out from the distinguished chairman of the committee when we are going to rise. It is Saturday afternoon and market day for the employees of the House. I want to ask the chairman if he is not willing to suspend now and give the employees of the House a chance to do their marketing Saturday afternoon. Many of them have to do their marketing this evening to last until Monday. Besides, this is a very good place to stop.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I appreciate what the gentleman from Texas says, and I anticipated that we would sit until half past 4. I wish to say, further, that I do not like to quit now, because every time thus far since the bill has been under consideration the first hour or two has been taken up by discussion irrelevant to the bill. When we get started, after the toboggan gets going, I do not like to stop the machine for fear somebody may throw a saw log in the way Monday morning.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say that the members of the faithful have dwindled down now to about 31, and if we work much longer we ought to call in a new shift.

The Clerk read as follows:

Coroner's office: Coroner, $1,800; morgue master, $720; assistant morgue master and janitor, $600; hostler and janitor, $480; in all, $3,600.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman a question or two. The discussion of the bill has thrown some sidelights on municipal government, and for the reason that I am not familiar with all that goes on in municipal government I would like to get some information. I think the chairman mentioned one city, Minneapolis, where he said the tax rate is 43 mills.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Forty-three mills.

Mr. O'CONNOR. On what valuation?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. On a two-thirds valuation.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Placed on the property by the assessors?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. And what value does he place on it?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. He comes nearer than they do in most other States in the matter of valuation.

Mr. O'CONNOR. In addition, do those people pay a State and county tax?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No; that comprises the total rate. But, in addition, the people improve their own streets and sidewalks.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does the gentleman know whether or not the assessors for the District of Columbia base their assessment on the recorded sales of real property?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do not know. I have heard all kinds of intimations, but I do not know how they arrive at the assessed value. The law states how the assessed value shall be arrived at, and I assume that the assessors follow the law.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What does it cost to administer the affairs of the District of Columbia from the clerical standpoint? How much is the annual expense of the clerical force that carries out the functions of the government?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman means strictly for salaries?

Mr. O'CONNOR. For salaries.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If I may be permitted, while the gentleman from Minnesota is looking up the answer to the gentleman's question, I will state that the assessed valuation of property in the District is not based on the recorded transaction. It is safe to say that it is not, because the recorded transaction no longer represents the actual value except so far as the stamp tax may go.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Why is that?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is not customary any longer to put in the record the value of the property.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is it not a violation of the oath of the notary public to omit it?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does the gentleman mean requiring the man to put the value of the property sold in the deed? A deed for $1 is just as good as for a million.

Mr. O'CONNOR. And the official records it without the real value being put in the deed?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. How do they know? The law does not require it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The law happens to be different in the locality where I come from. We have the civil law, and, while it does not prevail in this country, it has some principles which if applied throughout the country would be productive of a great deal of good.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have great respect and affection for Louisiana, but I doubt whether she should be considered as a leader in the United States.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I think there are many who agree with the gentleman from Illinois that Louisiana is not a leader; she is happy to be in company with great States like Illinois and other States whose Representatives lay the flattering unction to their souls sometimes that they and not the State they represent are the real leaders of civilization.

The Clerk read as follows:

Public Utilities Commission: Executive secretary, $4,000; accountant, $3,000; traffic engineer, $3,000; 2 assistant accountants, at $2,000 each; statistical clerk, $1,800; chief clerk, $1,800; inspectors—1 $1,800, 1 $1,600, 1 $1,400; inspector of gas and meters, $2,000; inspector of electric meters, $1,800; assistant inspectors—1 $1,200, 2 at $900 each; clerks—2 at $1,400 each, 1 $1,200; 2 messengers, at $720 each; in all, $34,640.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. What is the necessity for the statistical clerk at $1,800 in this commission? Apparently it is a new position.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It is. The reasons assigned were considered by the committee as sufficient. The committee used its pruning hook very extensively in the estimates, and in fact we cut the estimate of $23,000,000 down to $18,000,000, and I think we did pretty well. We selected only those matters we thought were absolutely essential to put in the bill. The testimony on this particular clerk is as follows:

We are asking for a new assistant accountant and one statistical clerk at $2,000.

I think we cut the amount down to $1,800 in the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. You left out two clerks at $700 and put in one at $2,000 and one at $1,800?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Oh, no; we left out two clerks at $100 each a month.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. For seven months.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman asked about the statistical clerk. The testimony is:

I would like to say at the outset that the people of the District of Columbia are paying annually to the public utilities that are being regulated by this commission in the neighborhood of $26,000,000, and the amount asked for the expenses of this commission, salaries and incidental expenses, is only about two-tenths of 1 per cent of the amount expended.

We struck out——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Two clerks at $700 each.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No; they were paid $100 a month for seven months.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is $700.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Two at $100 a month each, and we put in place of them one at $1,200.

Mr. WALSH. I am asking about the statistical clerk. What is he going to do?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I can not tell you all of the details of the Public Utilities Commission.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Perhaps he is going to consolidate the street railways of the District.

Mr. WALSH. If you are going to let a $1,800 statistical clerk undertake that, we can look for great improvement.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If the gentleman will look over the Public Utilities Commission and see the amount of money expended for the amount of work they do I think he will find it is rather small.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the language "statistical clerk, $1,800."

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already announced that there is no quorum present.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And the Chair has already decided that this point of order is well taken?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I have positive law in my hand that it is not well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. Unfortunately it is too late to make the point now.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WASLH having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13266, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD upon the judgeship bill, which I introduced to-day, about which I addressed the House this afternoon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, March 29, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting deficiency estimate of appropriation required by the Public Health Service for the fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 701); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimates of appropriations required by the War Department for the fiscal year 1921 (H. Doc. No. 702); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting alternative estimate of appropriation required by the Library of Congress for printing and binding, fiscal year 1921 (H. Doc. No. 703); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Librarian of Congress submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Library for printing and binding, fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 704); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimate of appropriation for hospital construction, Public Health Service (H. Doc. No. 705); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation urgently required for printing and binding for the Treasury Department for the current fiscal year (H. Doc. No. 706); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting further recommendation for passage of proposed legislation authorizing the President to present certain ordnance and ammunition to the Portuguese Republic; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. FORDNEY, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2856) to regulate dealing in leaf tobacco, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 774), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LANGLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13312) to extend the provisions of the pension act of May 11, 1912, to the officers and enlisted men of all State militia and other State organizations that rendered service to the Union cause during the Civil War for a period of 90 days or more, and providing pensions for their widows, minor children, and dependent parents, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 779), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. VESTAL, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to which was referred the bill (H. SENATE.

MONDAY, March 29, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, every step of our national way has been taken with prayer. We have recognized Thy sovereign right to rule and we have ever sought Thy grace. The blessings of a material sort, our vast resources, our limitless area, our strength and majesty and might fall short of the supreme blessing of life unless there is added to these Thy grace and Thy blessing. So we seek Thy favor day by day that Thou wilt guide us in our national path in honor, in peace, and in glory. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

McADOO, COTTON & FRANKLIN,
New York, March 27, 1920.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: I observe that Senator BORAH has introduced a bill to limit expenditures of presidential candidates in primary elections and in preconvention campaigns. I think the principle of this measure is absolutely right, and I earnestly hope that it may be promptly enacted by the Congress. One of the greatest perils to the Republic is the improper use of money in primary and general elections. The suggestion that the Senate appoint a committee to investigate the expenditures of the various candidates and their various committees in the campaigns they are conducting for the presidential nomination is highly commendable and ought to be promptly adopted.

With kindest regards, I am,
Cordially, yours, W. G. McADOO.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 27th instant, approved and signed the act (S. 3472) for the relief of the New Jersey Shipbuilding & Dredging Co., of Bayonne, N. J.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (at 12 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.). Morning business is closed. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, unless there is some special reason to the contrary—and I do not understand there is—I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, being House bill 11578.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11578) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as I remember, the pending amendment is that adding section 9 to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 28, the committee proposes to insert a new section, to be known as section 9, which in the renumbering will be section 7.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in the confusion of Saturday last a point of order was made by me as to both sections 3 and 9. The Chair overruled the point of order, and I should like to make an inquiry of the Chair if his ruling applied to both sections 3 and 9?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Tennessee that section 9 was under consideration, and the ruling applied to section 9.

Mr. McKELLAR. With the permission of the Chair, I should like to call his attention to another ruling on this very subject, and also to call the attention of the Chair to the difference between section 3 and section 9. I think there is some question about section 3, but, so far as section 9 is concerned——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will not the Senator from Tennessee allow us to proceed with section 9? That is the section which it has been determined is in order. I stated the other day that section 3 was, to some extent, dependent upon section 9. When we dispose of section 9 we shall then return to section 3, and the Senator can then make his point or order, and we can dispose of that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as I understand, the point of order has been overruled as to section 3, and the Chair now states that it has been overruled as to section 9 also?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think section 3 was ruled on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is mistaken. The provision which was before the Senate was section 9, and the Chair ruled on section 9. The Chair remembers that the Senator said that he made the point of order against both the amendments, but as only section 9 was before the Senate the Chair ruled on section 9.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well. I misunderstood the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is not debatable. The Chair based his ruling upon a former decision of the Vice President, which was sustained by the Senate by an overwhelming vote; and, upon appeal from the decision of the Chair on Saturday last, the Senate sustained the decision of the Chair. So far as the Chair is concerned, he has no desire to hear anything further on the subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, under those circumstances, of course, I shall not further discuss the point of order, but I desire to discuss the amendment. Mr. President, I desire to call the special attention of the Senate to section 9, which provides as follows:

SEC. 9 (a). That a commission is hereby created to be composed of the chairman and four members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate, appointed by the President of the Senate, the chairman and four members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker of the House, and a postal expert appointed by the Postmaster General. Such commission shall, by majority vote, appoint seven persons who are experienced in business or commercial transactions, or represent business or commercial organizations which make extensive use of the Postal Service, to act as an advisory council and to aid such commission in its work. Vacancies occurring in the commission or in such advisory council shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointments. No member of such advisory council shall receive any compensation for his services. The commission may employ and fix the compensation of such engineers, special experts, clerks, and other employees as it may deem necessary: Provided, That each executive department and independent establishment of the Government is hereby directed to furnish to the commission such engineers, special experts, clerks, and other employees as the commission may require, whenever, in the opinion of the head of such department or independent establishment, the public business thereof will not be materially affected thereby.

(b) The expenses of the commission and of the advisory council, including all necessary traveling expenses incurred by a member of the commission, a member of the advisory council, an engineer, special expert, clerk, or employee, under orders of the commission, in making any investigation or upon official business in other places than the place of his residence, shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor, approved by the chairman of the commission, which approval shall be conclusive upon the accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

(c) The commission shall investigate (1) the present method of transporting mails, and the facilities for distribution and delivery of mails in railway terminals, transfer offices, and railway postal cars; (2) the present system for transporting and distributing mails in the large cities in the United States and for dispatching mails leaving such cities; (3) the advisability of establishing a system of tunnels or pneumatic tubes in certain districts to facilitate the delivery of the mails therein; and (4) the advisability of establishing an aeroplane mail service and the future possibilities in regard thereto.

On or before March 1, 1921, the commission shall make a report to Congress containing a summary of its findings and such recommendations for legislation as it may believe to be proper.

Then there are several other sections, which I do not now read.

Section 3 provides as follows:

That the property and equipment of the pneumatic tube companies in the post-office buildings in New York, N. Y., Brooklyn, N. Y., Boston, Mass., Philadelphia, Pa., Chicago, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo., may remain where now located until June 30, 1921, or until the space occupied by such property or equipment is actually needed for post-office purposes: Provided, That no liability or expense shall be incurred by the Government hereunder.

This is another tube fight. There are pneumatic tubes in those six cities that were put in there by companies organized for that purpose and leased to the Government at very large rentals, and there has been a constant fight going on in Congress ever since those tubes were established because of the enormous expense attached to them. Innumerable reports have been furnished the Post Office Department, Congress, and the country to the effect that the work can be done for almost immeasurably less money by the use of different methods of transportation; that the tubes are very expensive; that they do not save time; and they are principally for the benefit of those who own stock in the tube companies.

That fight has been going on ever since I have been in Congress. Time and again, as I recall, Congress has declined to continue the use of the tubes because of the great expense, and notwithstanding that they have kept their paraphernalia in the post offices in these six cities for the purpose of getting some future Congress to take up their cause and thus tax the American people for their benefit. I am opposed to it. I do not think the Senate ought to agree to it. It has been stricken out of bills, and the President last year, I believe, vetoed an appropriation bill because the tube provision was put in the bill by the Senate. The question is one understood by everybody. It is special legislation for the corporations that have control of the tubes in these various post offices, and ought not to be allowed.

Commission after commission has been appointed. Commission after commission had made its report. We have all the information that is necessary about the matter, and it is just a question of whether Senators are in favor of the tube companies or in favor of the United States Government. That is all there is about it. We all know what it means. It means the question of whether we are going to permit these tube companies to tax the American people for their benefit or not.

I am not in favor of it. I do not think the Senate ought to go on record as being in favor of it. It was my opposition to it that led me to raise the point of order on this appropriation bill. With all due respect to the Chair, it is legislation. There is not any question about its being general legislation on an appropriation bill, in my judgment. That is past, but it is now for the Senate to say whether or not we shall agree to this private legislation that the department has time and time again reported against; that the officers of the Government having charge of these matters have time and time again said was an inefficient method of handling the matter; that it was an exceedingly expensive method of handling the matter; and yet the representatives of these tube people have been on hand every time, have made the fight at every Congress since I have been here, and we have had the fight coming up year by year. I believe the House has time and again decided against it, and I am not sure but I think the Senate has uniformly decided in its favor; but I want to say that I think the tube system is wrong. It ought to be abolished. We ought not to have any provision here allowing this machinery to be held over until another Congress. Why, of course, the tube people are just grasping at any straw to be put in a position where they can have the American people taxed for their benefit.

That is all I care to say about the matter, Mr. President. I hope we can have a record vote. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee asks for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the committee. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, we now have before us section 9, which is a proposition to create a joint commission between the two Houses for the purpose of investigating many subjects about which legislation is now demanded. This commission, as the bill provides, is to be composed of five Members of the House and five Members of the Senate, one expert from the Post Office Department, and seven men to be appointed by this commission to act as an advisory council without pay.
